Since then, two extensive studies have substantiated the British findings. One surveyed virtually all mongoloid births in Massachusetts from 1950 through 1966. The results, published in the New England Journal of Medicine in 1974, showed no link between fluoridation and mongolism. An even larger study published in 1976 covered approximately 1.4 million births in six major U.S. cities. Researchers at the Center for Disease Control investigated not only mongolism, but also cleft palate, heart abnormalities, clubfoot, and other common birth defects. Again, there was no association between fluoride and any of the defects. In short, the antifluoridationists' claim is based solely on the discredited Rapaport study.

CLAIM: FLUORIDE IS MUTAGENIC

A variation on the birth-defects theme is the charge that fluoride is a genetic hazard. Until recently, this claim was based on irrelevant or questionable experiments with fruit flies and plants. Then, in 1976, two researchers in Kansas City, Mo., reported that various levels of fluoride damaged chromosomes in the bone-marrow cells and sperm cells of mice. Although experts who reviewed the experiment noted several inconsistencies in the results, the question it raised was judged important enough to warrant further research.

Accordingly, joint studies were undertaken by the Laboratory of Developmental Biology and Anomalies at the National Institute of Dental Research, the Department of Biochemistry at the University of Minnesota, and the Laboratory of Cellular and Comparative Physiology at the National Institute on Aging. Tne scientists conducted four separate experiments, including tests on mice receiving acute doses of fluoride and mice raised for several generations on water containing 50 ppm of fluoride. None of the studies produced any evidence that fluoride damages chromosomes, even at levels 100 times that in fluoridated water supplies.

In Germany, meanwhile, an independent group of researchers reported similar results with human white blood cells, which are especially sensitive to mutagenic agents. Not only did fluoride fail to produce damage, it also evidenced an antimutagenic effect by protecting chromosomes against a known mutagen.

CLAIM: FLUORIDE CAUSES ALLERGIC REACTIONS

The charge that people can suffer allergic reactions or "intolerance" to fluoride gained prominence from anecdotal accounts by George L. Waldbott, M.D., an early opponent of fluoridation who founded the National Fluoridation News. Between 1955 and 1965, Dr. Waldbott reported numerous instances of patients experiencing nausea, headaches, "spastic colitis," or various other symptoms that he attributed to fluoride ingestion.

In the World Health Organization study described last month, a review of the Waldbott reports found no reliable evidence to support his contentions. The cases were judged to represent "a variety of unrelated conditions." Following the WHO study, the Public Health Service asked the American Academy of Allergy to evaluate the issue. After a review of the existing clinical reports, the executive committee of the academy concluded unanimously: "There is no evidence of allergy or intolerance to fluorides as used in the fluoridation of community water supplies."

CLAIM: FLUORIDE CAUSES CANCER IN ANIMALS

Possibly the most absurd evidence marshaled against flouridation is material purporting to show that fluoride induces cancer in animals. One series of studies frequently quoted by antifluoridationists was conducted by researchers in Texas in the 1950's. The first study involved a strain of mice that ordinarily gets cancer. Supposedly, the mice given fluoridated water developed tumors slightly earlier than similar mice on fluoride-free water. There were a few minor hitches in the experiment, however. All the mice were also fed a dog chow that, unknown to the investigator, contained 42 ppm of fluoride—or 10 to 100 times the amount any of the mice got in their water, thus making any comparison between the two groups invalid. A further botching occurred when the investigator miscalculated the amounts of fluoride in the water. Two scientists from the National Institute of Health reviewed the study in 1951 and dismissed it. Other experiments by the same investigator and a co-worker have long been discredited by subsequent research. Nevertheless, opponents of fluoridation still cite the Texas experiments as significant evidence that fluoride is carcinogenic.

Another study currently getting star billing in antifluoridation tracts is an experiment conducted with fruit flies in 1963. This time, legitimate findings are being substantially distorted. In that study, two strains of fruit flies exposed to 20 to 50 ppm of fluoride in their food experienced an increased incidence of melanotic tumors. Opponents of fluoridation interpret that to mean that fluoride can cause cancer. That's not so, according to scientists working at the National Cancer Institute. While humans may be physiological cousins to the mouse and other mammals, their kinship to the fruit fly is somewhat more distant.

Specifically, a melanotic tumor in a fruit fly is not the same as a cancerous tumor in a human or mammal. It is more akin to scar tissue, and, unlike a cancerous tumor, it's not malignant or harmful. It can be induced by a wide range of substances, including some vitamins and even lysine and typtophan, two amino acids essential for human growth and health. Fruit flies can also get malignant tumors, but there's no evidence that fluoride has ever caused any. Indeed, fluoride has never proved to be a carcinogenic in tests on a variety of animals, including rats, mice, guinea pigs, rabbits, hamsters, dogs, and sheep.

CLAIM: FLUORIDE CONTRIBUTES TO HEART DISEASE

In Wisconsin, opponents of fluoridation have often charged that it increases the number of deaths from heart disease. They base their claim on statistics that show a rise in heart deaths in the town of Antigo, Wis., since the introduction of fluoridation there.

The National Heart and Lung Institute has called the data a "misrepresentation of statistics." As one scientist points out, "The well-known fact that deaths from heart disease become more frequent as people grow older was overlooked." Since fluoridation was introduced in Antigo in 1949, the percentage of elderly people there has doubled. Between 1950 and 1970, for example, the segment of the population 75 years old or older increased 106 percent. When that factor is taken into account, the alleged effect of fluoride vanishes.

According to a 1972 study by the National Heart and Lung Institute, comparisons of fluoridated and unfluoridated communities reveal no difference in the rate of heart deaths. Furthermore, reported the institute, evidence from autopsy studies, from examinations of people exposed to acute doses of fluoride in industrial accidents, and from medical data on people who have drunk water naturally high in fluoride for a lifetime "all consistently indicate no adverse effect on cardiovascular health."

THE FACTS: ANTIGO LEARNED THEM THE HARD WAY

Of all the numerous ills that have been attributed to fluoridation—from cancer in humans to constipation in dogs—none has even been shown to be valid. In fact, the only known hazard of fluoridated water has nothing to do with drinking it. Patients undergoing kidney dialysis can be exposed to about 50 to 100 times the amount of fluid consumed by the average person. Accordingly, the National Institute of Arthritis and Metabolic Disease recommends that fluoride—as well as calcuim, magnesium, and copper—be removed from the tap water before it is used in an artificial kidney machine. Aside from that precaution, there is no genuine reason to worry about fluoridation.

In 1960, however, the residents of Antigo, Wis., didn't realize that scare stories being circulated by local opponents of fluoridation were false. Antigo voted to discontinue its 11-year practice of fluoridating the water supply. The decision eventually led to a study by public health officials, who wanted to learn what effects the end of fluoridation would have on the dental health of Antigo youngsters.

During 1960, dental personnel from the Wisconsin Division of Health examined nearly all children in the kindergarten, second, fourth, and sixth grades of Antigo's schools. The examiners recorded the number of decayed, missing, or filled teeth for each child. Four years later, they repeated the examination among children in all of the same grades except the sixth.

The kindergarteners in 1964 had a rate of dental problems 92 percent higher than their counterparts four years earlier. Among second-graders, the decay rate in permanent teeth was up 183 percent. Among fourth-graders, it was up 41 percent. A subsequent examination of sixth-graders showed a 91 percent increase in decay rates. In 1965, Antigo voted to reinstate fluoridation.

Despite persisting claims about heart deaths by local anti-fluoridationists, the people of Antigo today still drink fluoridated water. Meanwhile, about 100 million Americans do not, largely because of the fears raised by opponents of fluoridation. The simple truth is that there's no scientific controversy" over the safety of fluoridation. The practice is safe, economical, and beneficial. The survival of this fake controversy represents, in CU's opinion, one of the major triumphs of quackery over science in our generation.●

HANDICAPPING THE DISABLED

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, this country has been making significant progress in its efforts to understand and meet the special needs of handicapped people.

Legislation has been enacted to protect the rights of disabled persons and to encourage them to be full, contributing members of society. Last year a White House conference brought thousands of handicapped people together to study these problems and to seek ways of improving Federal programs designed to serve their needs.

But, while a great deal of progress has been accomplished, much remains to be done. It is the unfinished business I wish to address briefly today.

Adequate mass transportation is vitally important to a handicapped person. Without reliable transportation, a handicapped person cannot go to school, cannot get to work nor do any of the things which enable his or her to reach fullest potential and to make fullest contribution to society.

Therefore, I am particularly distressed by the negative, regressive position taken by the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) with respect to travel by blind people on commercial airlines. The FAA seeks enforcement of regulations which require all blind people to store their canes during airplane take-off and landing.

Enforcement of this ruling is insensitive to the needs and best interests of the blind.

I urge the FAA to reconsider its decision and let the blind keep their canes and similar devices with them at all times. In the event of an airplane emergency, all of us who are sighted probably have a better chance of survival in an emergency if the sightless people aboard have their canes near at hand. They could cooperate more easily in emergency procedures and thus avoid the panic and chaos which could spell doom for every passenger.

I hope my colleagues will read Garry Wills' article on this subject which appeared in the Washington Star on July 25, 1978.

THE BLIND, CANES AND PLANES

Bureaucracy, like many other things we gripe about (the weather, children, parents), is more beneficient than maleficent. Many services performed by the bureaucracy are indirect or invisible, and we only get a measure of their necessity when they are withdrawn.

Last year, the airlines that had blamed many things on federal regulation protested when the Federal Aviation Administration started withdrawing controls. Perhaps it is by way of revenge that United Airlines is enforcing one of the sillier rules made by the FAA, to make the federal agency look silly.

But whatever the motive, there is no question of the move's success. The FAA looks not only silly but coarse when it takes away the canes of blind people in airplanes, and stores them during take-off and landing. This is not a case of the blind leading the blind, but of the intellectually blind actually tripping up blind people.

The FAA claims that loose canes might strike or harm others if the plane were tossed about in an emergency. I assume that is physically possible. Then why doesn't the stewardess take away my glasses? They might fly off and poke my neighbor in the eye. For that matter, the pencil in my hand or the book I am reading every landing and take-off might fly out of my grasp and stick into or thump someone else.

This is not so absurd as it sounds. The blind person's cane is never far away from him, always within reach, grasped for instinctively. Cripples can leave a cane anywhere because they can see where it is when they want it. Not so a blind person. Blind pickets in a recent demonstration aptly chaned "FAA, See Our Way." The cane is a blind man's "eyes." It is as much his appendage, automatically protected, as are my glasses.

The FAA makes a false appeal to rules and fairness. All luggage must be of a size to store under the seat in front. If the businessman is deprived of his briefcase, on take-off and landing, because it won't fit there, why should the blind person be an exception?

That argument is an insult to intelligence. The cane is not "luggage," and the blind person is rightly an exception to some rules. Courts and post offices admit this when they allow Seeing Eye dogs to enter buildings where all other dogs are banned.

There are justifiable arguments against letting Seeing Eye dogs on airplanes. They are not trained to cope with the emergency procedures of an airplane in trouble. They would be just another thing to care for, when the stewardesses are the trained guides in emergency for blind and seeing alike. But banning dogs from planes is not to be considered on the same level as taking canes from the blind.

Would blind people, in the panic of emergency exit from the airplane, poke or injure others with their canes? No more than other passengers would do with their elbows, knees, or whatever. The blind person would be less panicky, more in control, with his cane—and therefore less a threat to others.

I think it is unhealthy for people to seize on this or that colorful excess of bureaucracy to attack the whole structure of social services—for instance, those who point to serious failures in certain public schools in order to attack the entire public education program, one of America's proudest achievements.

But in this time of rather undiscriminating reaction against bureaucracy and its costs, it is important for the bureaucrats themselves to eliminate weak and foolish targets for criticism. I can think of no better place to begin than the stupid treatment of blind people who "see" with their canes. It is unthinkable that they should be deprived of that essential support, doubling their handicap. It is time to stop blinding the blind.●

CONSUMER CO-OP BANK WILL FILL CREDIT NEED

HON. HENRY S. REUSS

OF WISCONSIN

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, the National Consumer Cooperative Bank is about to become a reality. Such a bank will fill a serious credit vacuum which exists for nonprofit, self-help consumer co-ops.

An article in Business Week of July 31, 1978, discussing the potential for development of the consumer co-op movement follows:

CONSUMER CO-OPS WIN SOME AID

Consumer cooperatives have sprouted thickly in the U.S. since inflation and the consumer movement took off in the early 1970s. Today about 1,000 of them are in business, up from only 277 just six years ago. But if their numbers are burgeoning, their record as successes is spotty. Co-op officials, untouched by the profit motive, tend to be stronger on goodwill than on business expertise.

Soon, though, the co-op movement will be getting some major help. On July 13, the Senate passed a bill creating a consumer cooperative bank, empowered to provide $1.5 billion in loans over the next five years and to offer technical assistance to co-op managers. An earlier House bill had provided more than twice that amount.

Whatever the compromise figure set by a conference committee of both houses, consumer co-ops are now certain of financial and technical assistance from the government. They can certainly use both.

Of course there are some outstanding successes among the co-ops. In Eau Claire, Wis., for example, the 41-year-old Consumers Cooperative Assn. operates four gas stations, a cafeteria, a snack bar, and a mammoth shopping center that has caused competing Jewel and A&P supermarkets to close their doors. Its sales top $35 million a year, it has returned $3.3 million to customers and members through rebates, dividends, and discounts during the past five years, and its stock is worth $3.4 million.

BANKS ARE LEERY

At the other end of the scale, the Uptown Neighborhood Food Co-op, located in a low-income area of Chicago, staggers along from day to day, barely making ends meet. "We're a small struggling business that the banks don't understand," says co-op coordinator David W. Garland.

Somewhere between the two, Co-op Auto of Washtenaw, in Michigan, stays comfortably in the black but lacks the capital necessary to expand its auto repair shop. "It takes a monstrous amount of money," says David Friedrichs, manager of Co-op Auto, "and the banks won't help." Without such help, two large co-ops, in Denver and Fitchburg, Mass., went out of business recently despite combined annual sales of more than $6 million.

Banks seldom lend to co-ops, says E. Carroll Arnold, vice-president of the Cooperative League of the U.S.A., because most bankers are innately suspicious of nonprofit enterprises and—more practically—because co-op managers frequently lack adequate training in business techniques. "Bankers have been fearful that co-ops are risky businesses, and in some cases they're right," Arnold concedes.

A co-op is a nonprofit business owned by its stockholders or members, each of whom casts a single vote in electing the board of directors. It seeks to apply democratic principles to business and to provide services that private industry either neglects or provides at what co-op officials regard as an unreasonably high price. Profits are returned to members, usually on the basis of how much they have used co-op services as customers.

At present, 1.2 million people belong to consumer co-ops, with additional thousands in housing and finance co-ops—the latter better known as credit unions Co-ops sell everything from legal advice to eyeglasses, but the bulk of their business is in food. Of the $477 million in sales recorded for 1977, $405 million represented food sales. This is a minuscule figure compared with 1977's total food sales of $218 billion, but it is a steadily growing one. Most co-ops are concentrated on the East and West coasts and in the tristate area of Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan. Some 75% are in urban areas.

What a consumer cooperative bank could do for them is indicated by the results after the creation of 13 banks for agricultural co-ops under the federal farm credit program in 1933. Sales and assets of agricultural co-ops increased 20-fold in the next four decades, while consumer co-ops, without access to major capital markets, merely tripled in size. "The bank could change urban economics dramatically," says Mark Creekmore, manager of the Ann Arbor (Mich.) Cooperative Society Inc.

That is precisely why they opposed it, say a group of senators who voted against the bill. The bank poses a threat to small businesses not eligible for subsidized credit, the senators say. For their part, supporters contend that small businesses have their own source of subsidized credit in the Small Business Administration.

OVER ITS HEAD

The most common problem that a federal bank could help solve—or prevent—is that of the small, successful co-op that expands overenthusiastically. A prime example is Greenbelt Consumer Services Inc., of Silver Spring, Md., a co-op that serves Maryland, Virginia, and Washington, D.C. Begun as a small shopping center in the late 1930s, Greenbelt had 25 supermarkets, 8 gasoline stations, 8 pharmacies, and 9 furniture stores by 1976, when it racked up $56 million in sales—and $500,000 in losses. Greenbelt was in over its head, says membership coordinator Donald H. Cooper. Its inadequately trained management could not meet the overhead costs incurred in operating 12 stores it had purchased from Kroger Co., the supermarket chain. Since then, Cooper says, Greenbelt has reorganized its management and begun spinning off unprofitable operations. It now plans to "concentrate on areas where we can do the job well."

Another co-op that might benefit from the bank's help is the country's largest and most publicized, Consumers Cooperative of Berkeley Inc. in California, with 90,000 members, 13 supermarkets that account for $75 million in annual sales, a weekly newspaper with a circulation of 80,000, 4 pharmacies, a hardware store, a savings and loan unit, and a burial society. The co-op has been in the red for the past two years despite a program of retrenchment. It has closed down a gas station and an auto repair shop and is preparing to close two supermarkets acquired only a few years ago to serve depressed areas in nearby Oakland.

Moreover, Berkeley's membership is split ideologically on the co-op's proper function: whether to serve customers as well as possible with high quality, low-cost goods, or to go further and try to achieve social aims. Members recently elected three conservatives to replace three activists on the nine-member board, but the controversy continues unabated.

One group wants to remove products of companies whose policies it opposes. At least one member has quit because the co-op "refuses to become socially committed"—for instance, by barring Coors beer because a brewery union is striking the company. Other members regard Berkeley as already socially overcommitted in its present state. Jack Citrin, a political science professor at the University of California, says he abandoned the co-op because he got tired of waiting in long lines and bagging his own groceries.

"The co-op philosophy at Berkeley is that you are all part of one big, happy family, choppers and checkers," says Citrin. "I got a lot of ersatz moralizing when all I wanted to do was pick up my groceries and get out.

PRICING

Not ideology but lack of business skill is the Berkeley co-op's greatest handicap, says Ivan Owen, senior vice-president of Lucky Stores Inc., a major California chain that competes with the co-op. Owen attributes this lack to the absence of a profit motive and adds that he has never regarded the co-op's prices as competitive with his.

Co-ops should certainly compete successfully on price, say such officials as Ann Arbor's Creekmore, who claims that his customers pay 20 percent to 30 percent below the prices of competing stores. But beyond price, say co-op spokesmen, they offer broader services than for-profit businesses do—for instance, providing nutritional information in food stores.

Like most of his colleagues, Creekmore is happy to see the establishment of a consumer co-op bank. The Ann Arbor co-op's new home insulation service could use a loan, he says, and he himself would welcome technical assistance on almost everything from inventory control to personnel recruitment. Manager Creekmore, 32, holds a PhD in sociology.●

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY UNANIMOUSLY OPPOSES TURKISH EMBARGO

HON. PAUL FINDLEY

OF ILLINOIS

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, on July 25 German Foreign Minister Genscher informed Secretary of State Vance that the nine foreign ministers of the European Community nations have unanimously asked the Federal Republic of Germany, as President of the Community, to inform Secretary of State Vance that they feel it would be helpful if the embargo against Turkey were lifted.

This is significant because it is the first time that the European Community nations have agreed to take a unified stand on the embargo issue.

The Europeans recognize that the embargo is not in the interests of Europe. I hope that my colleagues in the House will also recognize that the arms embargo against Turkey is not in U.S. interests.●

PROPOSITION 13: ITS EFFECT ON COUNTY HOSPITALS

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, on June 6 of this year California voters approved by a 2 to 1 margin proposition 13, a State constitutional amendment sharply reducing property taxes. The popularity of this amendment has prompted debate here in Congress over Federal spending and tax policies. If we respond to voter sentiment by revising our tax policies at the State and Federal level to make them more equitable, then I think great progress can be made toward worthwhile reform. But if our response to proposition 13's popularity is arbitrary cutbacks in government services, then I think we have seriously misunderstood what the California electorate was trying to tell us.

Proposition 13 is not an attack on government spending as much as it is a protest against government's failure to show services correlate with increasing government expenditures. The premise of proposition 13 is that if government has less to spend it will spend what it has more efficiently.

Unfortunately, this is not proving to be true. In California, government inefficiency continues, but vital services are being sacrificed in a manner which affects the poor most harshly.

Recent economic indicators suggest that the tax burden on our constituents may be too onerous. Federal spending has climbed steadily from about 18.7 percent of the gross national product in 1958 to an estimated 22.6 percent in 1978. Federal taxes have climbed as well. They surpassed 20 percent of the GNP only twice since 1958 (in 1969 and 1970), but they have been rising rapidly ever since 1976.

State and local taxes have simultaneously jumped significantly. Spending rose from 8.2 percent of GNP in 1959 to 11.5 percent in 1974. Last year it still hovered around 11 percent. State and local taxes were only 8.7 percent of the GNP in 1960, but by 1976 they represented 12.4 percent.

The problem with nonselective spending cuts is that the vital medical services upon which many Americans depend may be eliminated. I think it is ironic that the same year we are closer to an administration national health insurance proposal for all our citizens than ever before, we are debating restraints on spending that will deny medical benefits to the poor who need them most.

In California, the survival of county hospitals is at stake. Public hospitals, it must be remembered, are for many the sole source of care. Medicare and medicaid have not eliminated the gaps in financial protection for the poor and near poor, according to a report just issued by the Commission on Public General Hospitals, entitled "The Future of the Public-General Hospital: An Agenda for Transition." The Commission was organized in February 1976, with 17 members representing State and local government, medical education, and both public and private hospitals. Dr. Russell Nelson, president emeritus of the Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, was chairman, and Arthur Hess, former deputy commissioner of the Social Security Administration, directed the 2-year study financed by grants from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, and other interested groups.

The Commission found:

Millions of Americans have no other source of care if their county hospital is closed;

Millions of Americans fall between the cracks of eligibility requirements for medicare and medicaid; this means the poor, and particularly the near poor in many cases, cannot afford private care;

New standards for hospital cost accounting imposed by medicare and medicaid and health planning laws have diminished the ability of private hospitals to absorb bad debts and charity cases. The prevailing atmosphere in some private hospitals today is pay or no care;

National health insurance will be institutionalized in an incremental way. We cannot assume that the demise of our county hospitals will be halted by the enactment of a national health insurance bill. It will be years before a comprehensive program is actually in place; and

Too many county hospitals have inadequate capital for renovation or replacement of outmoded buildings and equipment.

These findings were all made before California voters approved Proposition 13. Since June 6, the plight of California county hospitals has become even more critical. I close my remarks with an article from the Los Angeles Times by Geraldine Dalleck analyzing the effect of State spending cuts on the delivery of medical care to California's indigent and near poor. Ms. Dalleck's report deserves our close attention because it alerts us to the potential for injustice if our health care system is not protected from arbitrary cutbacks.

PROP. 13'S IMPACT ON PUBLIC HEALTH: COSTLY PROPOSITION

(By Geraldine Dalleck)

Politicians usually answer public demands for tax reform or for less government spending in predictable ways: Either they cut social services where they feel certain there will be the least public outcry; or they eliminate the jobs of those public employes at the lowest rung of the vocational ladder. Or both.

Since the passage of Proposition 13, officeholders have done nothing to alter this pattern. In the spirit of these times, public health is a sitting duck. So it comes as no surprise to discover that California's county hospital and health clinic system will be crippled within the year.

Since this is not the first time that it has been subjected to budgetary paring, the county's public health system can ill afford further cuts. Between 1965 and 1977, California county supervisors closed 20 county hospitals, leased two, sold or transferred three to the University of California and turned nine others over to private management. Twelve of the county hospitals shut down were in counties where no similar public service is available.

Of course, cutbacks do change budget patterns. In fact, since its county hospital was closed in 1973, Imperial County has spent more to bury indigents than to care for them.

So far, the supervisors in both Santa Barbara and Shasta Counties have voted to close their hospitals to accommodate Proposition 13. Mendocino County plans to shut down its emergency room and San Mateo County will terminate its chronic care facility.

In Los Angeles County, Chief Administrative Officer Harry L. Hufford has recommended closing Long Beach General Hospital, eliminating 32 of the 57 health-care centers and canceling the rebuilding of earthquake-damaged Olive View Hospital. In addition, Hufford would cut 1,900 jobs in the L.A. County Dept. of Health Services and 10% of the mental health, alcoholic and drug abuse programs.

A $3.4 million cut in the state budget for public health and local assistance programs seriously limits county services for hemophilia, cystic fibrosis, renal dialysis, genetic disease prevention, family planning, crippled children and Native American health services.

Nor does the impending medical care crisis stop with dismantling facilities and services. At the same time that Proposition 13 is squeezing public hospitals, Medi-Cal is also in trouble, as the state considers ways to reduce Medi-Cal funding. On Thursday, for example, Medi-Cal covered abortions were virtually eliminated.

Short-sighted legislators propose deleting plans to increase the reimbursement rate for Medi-Cal services. At present, participating doctors are paid much less to treat Medi-Cal patients than they can charge private patients. Unless reimbursement fees are increased, physicians will be more reluctant than ever to care for Medi-Cal patients.

Even now, many of the state's 2.9 million Medi-Cal recipients cannot find a private physician to treat them. The situation is particularly acute for maternity patients; throughout California private obstetricians will not accept Medi-Cal patients. As a result, a large number of these women are being forced to turn to county services—the very services that are being cut.

And uninsured poor patients are even more vulnerable to medical care restrictions. They are routinely refused treatment at private hospitals and are shuttled to county facilities like so many pieces of baggage.

A two-week study of the records of Highland General in Alameda County, one of the largest county hospitals in California, found that the vast majority of transfers from the private Alameda hospitals to Highland General were medically indigent (uninsured) or Medi-Cal patients who were far sicker than the average county hospital patient.

"Of the 19 transferred patients," the study noted, "16 had life-threatening diagnoses: a brain hemorrhage, a stroke, a possible heart attack, a low blood sugar, three serious head traumas, a drug overdose, a skull fracture, a gunshot wound to the chest, two serious intestinal hemorrhages, three broken legs and a fractured pelvis combined with severe head trauma."

Under the new funding proposals the paradox of our health care system intensifies: Those most in need of medical care are least able to obtain it. California's poor (a disproportionate number of whom are elderly and minority group members) are less healthy than the rest of society, yet they receive significantly less health care. Until the environmental, social and economic circumstances in which these people struggle to survive are changed, they will continue to suffer high disease and mortality rates. Nevertheless, studies show that when medical services are provided, the health of the underprivileged improves.

Cuts in county health care will be hardest on those without health insurance who also depend on these services. The uninsured are usually those in the lowest paid jobs, or those without jobs.

Ironically, Proposition 13 is likely to increase the ranks of the unemployed and at the same time, eliminate the health care services these people must turn to.

Within our large cities, lack of primary care physicians was already extreme before Proposition 13. In Los Angeles 19 areas are underserved. In 1972, for example, there were 63 physicians per 100,000 population in the Watts-Willowbrook section of Los Angeles County while the county as a whole had 186 physicians per 100,000 residents. Because of the scarcity of doctors in underserved areas, county hospital outpatient departments and emergency rooms are the principal source of primary health care. The unavailability of alternate health care resources forces people to use emergency care to meet routine needs.

In large cities, county hospitals provide a disproportionately higher number of emergency services and in many rural counties they are the only sources of emergency care. In 1976, San Francisco General Hospital logged 60,148 emergency room visits—17.4% of all the emergency care provided in San Francisco County. Meanwhile, Los Angeles County-USC Medical Center provided emergency care to 336,763 patients—17.8% of all emergency treatment in L.A. County. The high use of these services proves just how necessary county hospitals are, and yet they are being ripped from the fabric of public health care like frills from a Puritan garment.

While a superficial appraisal of proposed health service cuts may suggest that these reductions will only affect the poor, closer analysis reveals that the entire community will suffer and, in the end, overall costs will increase as a direct result of limited health-care services.

This is especially true in the case of maternal and child health services and communicable-disease control.

The link between prenatal care and the condition of the child at birth is well established. Prenatal care is essential to prevent many of the complications that may arise during pregnancy. And the lack of prenatal care increases the risk of infant mortality and mental retardation.

Premature birth is responsible for half of all infant deaths, and it increases the likelihood of birth defects. A woman who has had no prenatal care is three times more likely to give birth to a premature infant than a woman who has had that benefit.

A child born mentally retarded or with cerebral palsy—only two of the birth defects associated with prematurity—because of inadequate prenatal care will ultimately require more of society's economic resources than adequate prenatal care would have cost.

County hospitals and clinics provide a substantial proportion of maternal and child health services for the poor, which are not available in the private sector. If these services are eliminated or reduced, many California children will go without basic preventive health services necessary for a productive life.

But prenatal care is not the only serious loss. Anything that limits health-care services creates community health problems. For one thing, the spread of communicable diseases increases. A case in point is Orange County.

In June, 1976, the Orange County Medi-Cal Services Administration instituted a policy of requiring everyone who could not pay for medical care to apply for Medi-Cal. The names of those who would not apply or who were without adequate identification were sent to the Immigration and Naturalization Service. For undocumented immigrants in Orange County, seeking medical care from public agencies became synonymous with the threat of deportation. As a result, fewer people sought such help.

By September of 1977, the Orange County Public Health and Medical Administration reported that since the previous year, the county had experienced increases in the following diseases: 57 percent in extrapulmonary tuberculosis, 47 percent in salmonellosis, 14 percent in infectious hepatitis, 53 percent in rubella, 153 percent in syphilis.

The treatment of primary syphilis and early stages of tuberculosis, the detection and treatment of phenylketonuria (a genetic deficiency) and rubella immunization programs are inexpensive, save millions of dollars a year in unneeded medical services and prevent suffering.

These preventive and public health services also reduce the incidence of illness in the entire society. Obviously, any cutbacks in county hospital services that make it more difficult for the poor to get treatment for communicable diseases endanger the broader community.

By decreasing communicable diseases among the poor the county health system directly serves the middle- and upper-class Californian. These groups also benefit from health-care programs that prevent costly long-term services to the mentally retarded and physically handicapped.

But county hospitals do much more than care for the poor. California's larger public hospitals are associated with medical schools, and they provide a wide range of highly specialized services:

—Los Angeles County-USC Hospital, for example, operates one of only three burn treatment units in the county. In addition, it has the only communicable disease ward in the city.

—Harbor General Hospital operates a clinical study center which provides research and services in metabolic diseases, unduplicated anywhere in the county. It is also one of the few hospitals in its area that operates a neonatal intensive care center and a renal transplant unit.

—Another Los Angeles county hospital, Rancho Los Amigos, provides long-term rehabilitation and physical therapy services utilized by the entire county.

Further, California county hospitals are a major resource for training physicians and other health-care professionals. In 1974, 47.8 percent of the total number of interns and residents trained in Los Angeles received instruction at county hospitals. In California, 14 county hospitals conduct family-practice residency training programs. Indeed, these hospitals are a primary source of training for doctors who will be responsible for primary care throughout the state.

California's county hospitals and clinics provide services upon which the entire community depends. Responding to Proposition 13 by eliminating these benefits will lead to increased suffering and illness. Because the California electorate demanded such severe budget cuts they have, in fact, placed property rights over human life.

Under present disastrous plans for county supported health care systems, doctors and services for the poor will soon be scarce. In fact, if these proposals are implemented, perhaps California should post a new sign at its border beside the speed and littering warnings and direct it to the poor, the unemployed and the elderly:

"The Surgeon General has determined that entering California is dangerous to your health." ●

CLEAN BILL OF HEALTH FOR CETA

HON. CLARENCE D. LONG

OF MARYLAND

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives will in the next few weeks begin debate on the reauthorization of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (H.R. 12452). I support the CETA system and I feel that in the 4 years of its operation it has been instrumental in addressing both the problems of structural and countercyclical unemployment. Yet much of the current debate about CETA has centered on isolated anecdotes in the program rather than its overall effectiveness. In order to present a balanced view of the CETA program, I ask that several articles about the CETA program in Baltimore be placed in the RECORD.

I am pleased to report that Baltimore, after an extensive investigation, by the Department of Labor, was given a clean bill of health. I cite two editorials that appeared in Baltimore newspapers concerning that investigation. The editorials praise the CETA operation in Baltimore. The first is from the News American of June 16, 1978.

GOOD NEWS

A U.S. Department of Labor investigation of Baltimore's federal jobs program is completed, and the city—we're glad to say—has obtained virtually a clean bill of health.

We say "virtually" because three jobs program employees were dismissed because of "technical violations" of federal hiring standards.

Marion Pines, director of the Manpower office, said she will not appeal the case, but added that all three "did nothing wrong—we at the Manpower office made some technical errors."

The technical errors involved the miscalculation of the length of time each of the three had been unemployed before obtaining jobs under the federal Comprehensive Employment and Training Act.

Actually, in Title VI of CETA, to qualify for which a person has to have both low income and have been unemployed for 15 out of the last 20 weeks, no errors at all were discovered. Seventy percent of the 3,600 persons-funded are on Title VI.

No favoritism or nepotism was founded by the Labor Department probers.

Mayor Schaefer said he was "very pleased" with the findings, in view of the fact the probe showed no evidence of abuse or patronage, and said: "It's good news to hear we can run a program where there are 20,000 applicants and we have only three technical difficulties."

We share the mayor's pleasure.

A similar editorial appeared in the Baltimore Evening Sun on June 16, 1978, and the portion dealing with the Baltimore program is excerpted here:

THE CETA PROBE

The Department of Labor has investigated Baltimore's use of funds from the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA) and has given the city a generally clean bill of health. The department did order the manpower office to fire three unnamed employees who were illegally hired. And it found a technical violation in the CETA job held temporarily in late 1976 by Louis R. Palughi, nephew of the city's special services chief. But even here the department found the city's behavior "represented an honest effort to comply with CETA [nepotism] regulations."

If we are to believe the Labor Department's investigation was thorough and objective—and there is no reason not to—the Mayor's Office of Manpower Resources gets a ringing endorsement. The CETA program is not rife with nepotism and favoritism, and the dozen or so cases cited in this newspaper last December (including relatives of a judge, the sheriff, a prominent legislator and one of this newspaper's photographers) have now been cleared. The number of cases on which the department has found Marion Pines' manpower office in technical violation constitute a minute percentage of the 3,500 CETA employees in the city . . .

The clean bill of health is crucial for a city that relies so heavily on federal job funds, particularly now that Baltimore is one of the cities selected for participation in the $400 million Private Sector Initiative Program. That CETA is being run honestly cannot help but make it a better program.●

AIRLINE PROFITS SOAR, BUT SO WILL PASSENGER EXCISE TAXES

HON. CHARLES A. VANIK

OF OHIO

● Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives will soon be considering the Noisy Aircraft Revenue and Credit Act of 1978. Certain provisions of this legislation would transfer about $2.3 billion from the airport-airway trust funds directly to the airline industry.

The Noisy Aircraft Revenue and Credit Act of 1978 is designed to help airlines meet Federal regulations on noise pollution by 1985. Under this regulation, 1,600 aircraft would have to be replaced reengined, or retrofitted. The airlines claim they cannot afford to meet the 1976 regulations by 1985. In reality, however, the industry is enjoying record profits and is currently making extensive aircraft purchases without Federal assistance.

Presently, airlines are in a boom period where earnings for scheduled airlines reached $563 million in 1976, $754 million in 1977, and $80 million in the first quarter of 1978. Moreover, estimates for earnings in the second quarter of 1978 range from $350 to $450 million. United Airlines' profit alone for the second quarter of 1978 reached $91.9 million and Trans World Airlines' profit reached $37.1 million for the second quarter of 1978. Eastern Airlines has also reported record profits for the second quarter of 1978.

The recent purchases of aircraft, without Federal aid, also illustrates the fact that airlines are currently capable of compliance with Federal regulations. Eastern Airlines is purchasing 23 A–300 Airbuses, costing $778 million. Recently, United Airlines announced the purchase of 30 B–767's and 30 B–727's. The $1.6 billion needed to purchase these aircraft is financed without any Federal assistance. In addition, Delta and Northwest Airlines have spent $1.25 billion each on the purchase of quieter aricraft since 1973. Thus, it appears obvious that airlines and airline manufacturers, are presently replacing their fleets and have the capacity to meet Federal regulation by 1985—without Government assistance.

Moreover, under the Noisy Aircraft Revenue and Credit Act of 1978, funds would be allocated according to the amount of revenue an air carrier generates. As a result, funds would be allocated according to an airlines' share of the market, and not according to the number of noisy aircraft it operates.

In the Rules Committee's preliminary consideration of this matter, I requested that several amendments be made in order to try to prevent the bill from picking passengers' pockets to pay for the airlines' new planes. I will pursue that course until I am satisfied that the public is being treated fairly. They are not as the bill is currently written.

I hope that the Rules Committee will permit the House to make appropriate amendments to this legislation.●

THE TAX REFORM TRAP: AN INTERESTING PERSPECTIVE ON THE SHAPE OF THE DEBATE ON TAX REFORM AND TAX RATE REDUCTION

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Paul Craig Roberts, a member of the Senate staff, a senior research fellow at the Hoover Institute at Stanford University, and a professor of economics at George Mason University in Virginia, has offered us an interesting perspective on the nature, the shape of the debate going on in Congress and throughout the country on tax reform and tax rate reduction.

Dr. Roberts poses and answers the question: What's at stake in the final decision? That answer explains the reaction of the administration and of certain Members to suggestions that we reduce income tax rates. It also gives us hints of the coalition which is being brought together to assure permanent tax rate reductions for all Americans.

[From the New York Times, July 26, 1978]

THE TAX REFORM TRAP

(By Paul Craig Roberts)

WASHINGTON.—These are dangerous times for the taxpayer. Revolts don't always succeed. They often fail, and in the process of being put down, the taxpayer can come out a net loser.

On a national level, taxpayers are an uncertain political force. Their visit numbers and different positions in the tax brackets make them easy to segment and difficult to organize. Their dispersal across all Congressional districts prevents them from becoming the special interests of specific politicians. In a system built to serve organized interest groups, taxpayers, as a group, have no political patron.

Taxpayers have powerful opponents. One is the Internal Revenue Service, whose interest is to collect more taxes, not less. Whenever there is any prospect of taxes being cut, the Treasury Department visibly worries about deficits. "Inflation is the cruelest tax of all," intone the Treasury's men. Less visible but more powerful opponents of the taxpayer are: One, Congressional spending committees that want more taxes not fewer to hand out; two, constituents that are the organized recipients of the handouts; and three, Federal agencies that thrive on administering the Congressional spending bailiwicks.

Skillful opponents of tax reduction can divide the taxpayers with proposals to shift the tax burden instead of reducing it. This political manuever goes under the names of tax reform to help the poor.

Tax reform to help the poor is easy because the poor don't pay any taxes. I.R.S. statistics show that in 1976 the bottom 50 percent of taxpayers paid only 6 percent of the total personal income taxes. Therefore, for only 6 percent of the money, the Government could buy half of the taxpayers' votes. This half, plus the millions who have already been dropped from the tax rolls as a result of lower tax bracket reforms during the 1970 to 1975 period, could vote themselves benefits for which they don't have to pay.

There is a constituency here politicians could organize into a winning coalition for reforms that shift, rather than reduce, the tax burden. In tomorrow's politics, being liberal may become a rational, self-interested response of political entrepreneurs to this system of representation without taxation. What more can a politician achieve than constituents who are both economically and politically dependent?

The I.R.S. is a great supporter of tax reform. The tax men are quick to point out that tax cuts in the lower brackets can be paid for by closing loopholes. This looks on the surface like a fair swap with no net gain to the I.R.S. In reality, it is a cleverly designed tax increase. In our system of progressive income tax rates, shifting the burden upward means increasing it, because inflation continually moves people out of lower brackets (that were cut) and into higher brackets (that weren't).

With 50 percent of the taxpayers paying practically no taxes on their money incomes, the I.R.S. is attempting to recoup by taxing their fringe benefits. Thus the campaign against tax loopholes. To most people, loopholes mean three-martini lunches, oil depletion allowances, and real estate shelters, but 70 percent of the dollar value of the loopholes goes to people who are not rich. Pension benefits and medical insurance provided by employers, Social Security benefits, military disability pensions, disabled coal miners' benefits, public assistance, sick pay, G.I. benefits, and unemployment benefits are all on the Treasury's loophole list.

Whether taxes are cut or reformed will be determined by the outcome of the political fight over handout power. What can be handed out through tax breaks and lower tax rates cannot be handed out by Congressional spending committees and Federal agencies. Tax reform stripped of sanctimonious talk is nothing but a move against the handout power of the tax-writing committees. Liberals may fancy that it is a fight between haves and have-nots, but, in truth, political power is a matter of handout power, and it is merely a fight among members of Congress.

That doesn't mean that the rest of us are unaffected by the outcome. If the private sector can't form capital, it can't provide jobs. The Legislative and Executive branches don't really mind unemployment because it means more Federally created jobs, public works and Government spending. Pork-barrel legislation builds the spending constituencies and welfare dependencies of Congress and the Executive branch, and means more patronage for individual politicians.

Tax reform masquerades as equity for the poor, while furthering the growth of political dependencies. Such moral masks outlive their wearers and are the hand-me-downs of political life. Over time, every ruling class is discredited by failures, but the mask that hides the self-interest of government endures.●

FORMER SECRETARIES OF TREASURY ENDORSE INTERNATIONAL FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, next week the House is scheduled to consider H.R. 12931 which is the foreign assistance appropriations for fiscal year 1979. One of the key provisions of that bill provides for future U.S. financial participation in the multilateral international development banks.

A number of attempts will be made to amend that portion of the bill, including an effort to insert legislative restrictions on U.S. contributions to the development banks and an effort to reduce the level of U.S. contributions to those institutions. I believe that both efforts are ill-advised and should be defeated, because they could severely hamper the vital work of these banks, and because they are opposed to the important U.S. interest in the concept of multilateral economic development of Third World countries.

In order to convey the momentousness of this legislation, I would like to commend to my colleagues' attention a joint statement by eight former Secretaries of the Treasury concerning this bill. This truly bipartisan group's statement constitutes a powerful argument for the passage of the bill in its present form and for the principle this bill embodies.

The statement follows:

JOINT STATEMENT BY FORMER SECRETARIES OF THE TREASURY

As former Secretaries of the Treasury, we want to reaffirm again this year our belief that United States participation in the international financial institutions—the World Bank and the regional development banks—is vital to American economic and political interests.

Since the Second World War successive Presidents of the United States—Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon and Ford—with strong bipartisan backing in the Congress, have supported the World Bank and the regional development banks as major elements of our foreign policy.

As Secretaries of the Treasury during this period, we have consistently nurtured the growing role of these institutions in the world economy.

We did so because these institutions provided the most orderly, effective and business-like way of promoting international cooperation between the developed, democratic nations in assisting the poorer, less developed nations in giving hope for solid economic progress to their peoples.

The multilateral development banks provide a way of sharing the burden equitably, which otherwise would tend to fall disproportionately on the richer and larger nations such as the United States.

These institutions are set up so that the decisions on loans, hard or soft, are made by Executive Boards of Directors, representing member countries, but voting on a weighted basis, reflecting quantity of support, on recommendations from a staff of international civil servants. By this device, the politicizing of aid by individual nations can be avoided; appropriate terms and conditions to make the lending effective can be attached without the resentment of the borrower being directed at an individual lending nation; and the types and forms of loans can be made to reflect the points of view of borrowers and lenders alike. Moreover, procedures following up the extension of the loan can be administered so as to assure its appropriate use without the charges of interference that might otherwise attach to an individual lending nation.

We firmly believe that a continued U.S. leadership role in the multinational financial institutions is vitally necessary to a continuance of these organizations along the efficient, business-like lines described, and to our own cooperative effort in the world.

The House of Representatives will soon vote on the FY 79 Foreign Assistance Appropriations Bill. The House Appropriations Committee will report the bill to the floor with an $876 million reduction in the Administration's budget request. It is crucially important that no additional cuts be made. Any such cuts would seriously erode the U.S. position in the banks by putting the United States further behind in meeting past pledges. We believe that any further reduction this year would run counter to important U.S. interests and policies.

Unfortunately, it is possible that amendments may be offered again this year which would earmark U.S. contributions to the banks in a way which will prohibit their use for loans for certain countries and certain commodities. If such restrictive amendments were to be adopted, they would effectively end U.S. participation in the banks. The Charters of these multilateral institutions do not permit the banks to accept funds so conditioned by individual members. These institutions have become such an integral part of the world economic system and U.S. foreign policy that such a result would gravely undermine the world economy and the future well-being of the American people.

We are pleased that the Appropriations Committee decided not to recommend any legislative restrictions on the use of funds appropriated in this year's bill. We urge the House and the Senate to reject any restrictive amendments that would have such devastating effects on the banks and U.S. participation in them, as well as to vote down any further reductions in the appropriations for the World Bank Group and the regional development banks.

NEVADA'S FIRST TV STATION

HON. JIM SANTINI

OF NEVADA

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. SANTINI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues an event that must be considered a milestone in Nevada journalism. KLAS–TV Channel 8 in Las Vegas, Nevada's first television station, is celebrating its 25th year of service to the southern Nevada area on Thursday, July 27.

As one of the leaders in broadcast journalism, programing, production, and facilities in the State, KLAS is deserving of special recognition on its silver anniversary.

But, the event cannot be fully appreciated without a brief look at the station's illustrious past.

It all began in a small facility in July 1953, when then-Governor Charles Russell pulled the switch bringing power to the transmitters at TV–8 and opening up Nevada to the fascinating and informative world of television.

The original station was located just off what is now the Las Vegas "strip," and it feature some of the most diversified programing imaginable. It picked up segments from all three networks as well as the old DuMont Television Network. Nostalgia buffs will remember such favorite programs as Boston Blackie, Range Rider, Hopalong Cassidy, Danny Thomas, and Cashman Theater.

As the station grew, it became widely know and reputable. Finally, in March 1968, the telecasting property was purchased by Hughes Tool Co. (now Summa Corp.). KLAS became a CBS affiliate and a new transmitter was erected. This brought about better and more widely received service to Las Vegas viewers.

Then, in 1971, a man by the name of Mark Smith came into the KLAS picture. Mark moved the station to a new building and changed KLAS from just a television plant to a facility capable of a wide variety of major productions. Mark thought of KLAS in terms of a "West Coast" production center and set about making his vision come true. Today, Mark's dream is a reality.

Mr. Speaker, for 25 years, the people of Las Vegas and southern Nevada have been the beneficiaries of outstanding KLAS service.

I join the thousands of viewers and friends of KLAS in wishing the new owners, the management, and staff a happy 25th anniversary and many more years of success.●

ERA's FUTURE

HON. DEL CLAWSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. DEL CLAWSON. Mr. Speaker, the Honolulu Advertiser of Monday, July 24, contained a column from the Washington Post which originated with the Washington Post Service, commenting on the future of the equal rights amendment. It is a discussion which in my opinion warrants the attention of my colleagues in the House who have not already had the opportunity to read it. The column by Mary Russell is included at this point in the RECORD:

ERA's FUTURE

(By Mary Russell)

WASHINGTON.—The thousands of women who descended on Washington 10 days ago, urging Congress to give them more time to win ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment by the necessary 38 states, may have been making a mistake.

It is true, of course, that with the ratification drive currently three states short and with the seven-year ratification deadline up next March 22, the prospects for ERA are gloomy. But at this point it would perhaps be better if the deadline were not extended.

In part, this is because of immediate practical problems. Even if Congress passes a controversial extension of the deadline in an election year, it may also allow states that have approved ERA to rescind their votes.

This raises the possibility that ERA supporters might lose more votes than they could gain by an extension. It also means the issue might be tied up for years in the courts, since the legality of rescission has never been tested.

In addition, ERA proponents, already on the defensive, would be burdened with another difficult charge to defend: that they unfairly changed the rules of the game. The charge is already emerging, even among some who are sympathetic to the women's movement. As political consultant Curtis Gans recently wrote, "There is something fundamentally incongruous when a movement committed to the principle of political equality seeks unequal treatment from the law."

But perhaps most important, what would result if the deadline is not extended is a reassessment by the women's movement of where it's been, where it's going, and what went wrong.

Loss of ERA for now would be tragic. Pressures on businesses, unions, judges and politicians to continue gains for women would likely be eased. The country would have to face the fact of telling half its citizens that the Declaration of Independence's phrase, "all men are created equal," does not mean them.

But that certainly would not be the end of the issue. Women's leaders clearly are determined to press the matter, and they surely would start over to pass the amendment again in Congress.

That new beginning might be best. This is not only because it would make relatively little difference in the time which then would be needed for ratification by three-fourths of the states—the movement, after all, has been asking for seven more years—or that it would remove many other complications. It is also because it would force that badly needed reassessment of the movement's strategies.

For one thing, it seems clear that the movement needs to shift its emphasis from rhetoric—from marches and conferences and consciousness-raising—to expertise in gut-level politics. We know the issues, but we do not know how to translate them into political action.

This is not to point the finger of blame. For a movement that was "born again" only in the late 1960s, it has made incredible gains. Women have moved into jobs traditionally closed to them, from airline pilots to a woman appointee to the Federal Reserve Board. They are entering schools of law and medicine at record rates, and they have won such discrimination suits as the landmark AT&T case.

Everything, however, is not roses. While more women are entering the work force than ever before, they are filling lower-paying jobs and, compared with the pay men receive, are actually losing ground. In 1971, women earned 63 cents for every dollar a man earned, but by 1975 this was down to 57 cents. The ERA's equal protection clause is necessary to insure a legal umbrella for further advances.

But if the ERA and the movement are to make further gains, involved women will have to take stock and change.

The women's movement must also review its political tactics. A weary Chicago legislator who had voted consistently for ERA says the stridency on both sides was wearing him down. "To tell you the truth, I would have promised my vote to the first side which offered not to yell at me any more," he remarks only half facetiously.

One of the most ill-conceived tactics is the decision not to hold conventions in states that haven't ratified ERA. It is big cities that suffer the loss of trade from this boycott. Yet ERA gets most of its support from big city legislators.

Florida is a classic case. The kingpin of the Florida senate and the leading ERA foe, Dempsey Barron, is an arch-conservative Democrat from the Florida panhandle. But it is Miami that is hurt by the boycott in Florida. Barron, as is typical of many rural state legislators, views the city as a blot on the landscape. Boycotting Miami could not please him more. The basic tenet of political strategy is to hurt your enemies, not your friends.

A woman delegate at the House conference last year, watching for a while as the movement leaders—Friedan, Steinem, Bella Abzug—spoke, summed up the needs of the movement today. I'd trade them all for one female Lyndon Johnson," she said.●

FACILITATING SMALL BUSINESS EFFORTS TO INCREASE PRODUCTION AND EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, the 13 million small businesses in the United States comprise 97 percent of the total number of American business firms. Thus, any assessment of the state of this Nation's economy quickly turns to a consideration of production levels and employment opportunities prevailing within our small business community.

In numerous meetings with small businessmen in recent months, I have continually heard the charge that the existing array of restrictive tax structures and oppressive Government regulations are seriously impeding capital formation and needed expansion. Faced with such conditions, small business faces an uphill battle in its efforts to create jobs, to increase production, to compete effectively in world markets, and ultimately to win the battle against inflation.

The legislation I am introducing today is born of the conviction that the Federal Government must act expeditiously to correct critically shortsighted tax formulas and regulations which when paired with current business conditions, seriously exacerbates the economic hostilities facing small businessmen. The measure recognizes the plight of small business and seeks to remedy several key problems inhibiting capital formation and the concomitant expansion of small business so necessary for a healthy economy.

The major provisions of this bill are as follows:

First. Simplify current depreciation rules through a 3-year useful life straightline depreciation formula;

Second. Provide investors with a capital gains rollover if holdings are reinvested in a small business within a 2-year period; and

Third. Increase the size of a small securities offering that may be made under Securities and Exchange Commission regulation A from the current $1,500,000 to $3,000,000.

The first section of this bill permits a business to more expeditiously recover capital invested in machinery and equipment through a formula allowing depreciation deductions to be taken over a 3-year period on purchases of property not exceeding $100,000 in value. Small business firms electing this straight line depreciation based on a 3-year uselife formula for eligible property would be able to dispense with an inordinate array of depreciation regulations, reduce their tax-return paperwork, and writeoff machinery and equipment approximately three times faster than under present law.

While all businesses would be entitled to this accelerated depreciation allowance, the limitation of this allowance to the first $100,000 of equipment purchased each year will make this provision especially attractive to smaller business concerns.

The proposal directly addresses two key problems inherent in the present depreciation allowance formula which are severely impeding business efforts to secure capital: Costly compliance with a plethora of complex reporting requirements, and an inability to adequately reflect the impact of inflation on depreciation allowances.

Because depreciation is one of the most complicated areas of tax law, small businesses face the prospect of either retaining experts and, therefore, expensive accounting and legal services, or unaware of those specialized allowances for which they are eligible, do not avail themselves of certain depreciation allowances designed to help small businesses.

Moreover, a 3-year straight line depreciation allowance would enable firms to better absorb the adverse effects of inflation. Recent studies have shown that an accelerated depreciation allowance would free smaller businesses in many instances from the prospect of having to wait a longer period of time to recover money worth increasingly less each year and from not having the option of buying new equipment sooner, before it becomes increasingly more expensive.

A second provision in the measure I am proposing would permit investors to defer tax on an otherwise taxable capital gain if that profit received in the transaction is reinvested within 2 years in a small business. While not a new concept, this so called capital gains rollover is a sensible and fairly straightforward means to boost the attractiveness of a small business as a prime target for investment.

Precedent for this formula can be found in those rules and regulations governing reinvestment of the proceeds of the sale of a personal residence.

Endorsed this year by coordinators of the Small Business Washington Presentation, this provision would, as expressed at that forum, provide "relief to the small business which has an extremely difficult time attracting, retaining, and recovering capital."

Further addressing the problem experienced by many small businesses seeking vitally needed capital, the third section of this legislation provides for an increase from $1,500,000 to $3,000,000 of that amount of small business securities offerings which are exempt from certain Securities Exchange Commission regulations governing securities offerings.

As the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs stated in an April 1978 report (95–763):

> Federal securities laws have always reflected the national policy of encouraging the growth and expansion of small business.

Raising the SEC regulation exemption ceiling has been a method in which Congress has traditionally endeavored to respond to small business's need to finance modernization and expansion, and the needs of newly organized ventures requiring a considerable amount of seed capital.

In times of increasingly tight money, small businesses often find that banks and private sources may not be willing or, indeed, able to provide necessary risk capital, and turn more to public offerings as a source of such capital. We must assist small business efforts to seek public financing and recognize that the current $1,500,000 SEC regulation A ceiling, though designed to facilitate such financing, is due to present economic conditions, indeed, an inadequate level to small business firms seeking to secure desperately needed capital.

The report of the SBA Task Force on Venture and Equity Capital for Small Business, released in January 1977, by the Small Business Administration, recommended that the small offering exemption be increased from the $500,000 ceiling to $3,000,000. While the 95th Congress acted earlier to increase this ceiling to $1,500,000, the SBA report underscores the urgent need to raise this limit to $3,000,000.

The SBA Task Force makes the case for raising the SEC regulation A in the following unequivocal terms:

> It is alarming that venture and expansion capital for new and growing small businesses has become almost invisible in America today. In 1972 there were 418 underwritings for companies with a net worth of less than $5,000,000. In 1975 there were four such underwritings. The 1972 offerings raised $918 million. The 1975 offerings brought in $16 million. Over that same period of time, smaller offerings under the Securities and Exchange Commission's (SEC's) Regulation A fell from $256 million to $49 million and many of them were unsuccessful. While this catastrophic decline was occurring, new money raised for all corporations in the public security markets increased almost 50 percent from $28 billion to over $41 billion.

Congress must expeditiously and effectively respond to the economic one-two punch of inflation and capital scarcity which is so severely threatening the survival of so many of this Nation's small businesses.

I am hopeful that by adoption of this legislative package providing: First, an increase in the SEC Regulation A ceiling; second, a 3-year straightline depreciation allowance; and third, a formula for a capital gains rollover, we can begin to relieve the adverse economic consequences especially hard hitting such a large number of our smaller business firm.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation, and I request that the full text of this bill be inserted at this point in the RECORD:

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide for nonrecognition of gain on sales of certain business interests and for accelerated depreciation of certain property, and to amend certain securities laws to facilitate private offerings and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Business Incentives Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. STRAIGHT-LINE DEPRECIATION FOR CERTAIN PROPERTY BASED ON 3-YEAR USEFUL LIFE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 167 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to depreciation) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(q) STRAIGHT-LINE DEPRECIATION FOR CERTAIN PROPERTY BASED ON 3-YEAR USEFUL LIFE.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—In the case of property—

"(A) with a useful life of 3 years or more, and

"(B) with respect to which the taxpayer elects to have this subsection apply, the term 'reasonable allowance' as used in subsection (a) means an allowance computed under the straight-line method (within the meaning of subsection (b)(1)) based on a useful life of 3 years.

"(2) $100,000 BASIS LIMITATION.—The taxpayer may not elect to have this subsection apply to property placed in service during the taxable year to the extent that the aggregate basis (as determined under subsection (g)) of such property exceeds $100,000.

"(3) CONTROLLED GROUPS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a controlled group of corporations—

"(i) all corporations which are component members of such group at any time during the calendar year shall be treated as one taxpayer for such year, and

"(ii) the dollar amount specified in paragraph (2) shall be apportioned, in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe by regulation, among such component members.

"(B) DEFINITION OF CONTROLLED GROUP OF CORPORATIONS.—For purposes of subparagraph (A), the term 'controlled group of corporations' has the meaning given such term by subsection (a) of section 1563, except that for such purposes—

"(i) the phrase 'more than 50 percent' shall be substituted for the phrase 'at least 80 percent' in each place it appears in such subsection, and

"(ii) the determination of whether a corporation is a component member of a controlled group of corporations at any time during a calendar year shall be made on December 31 of such year.

"(C) CONTROLLED GROUPS CONTAINING PERSONS OTHER THAN CORPORATIONS.—Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, principles similar to the principles of subparagraphs (A) and (B) shall be applied to groups of persons under common control where one or more of such persons is not a corporation.

"(4) ELECTION.—The election under paragraph (1) with respect to any property shall be made at such time, in such manner, and subject to such conditions as the Secretary may prescribe by regulations."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to property placed in service after the date of the enactment of this Act, in taxable years ending after such date.

SEC. 3. NONRECOGNITION OF GAIN ON CERTAIN SALES AND EXCHANGES OF CERTAIN BUSINESS INTERESTS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Part III of subchapter O of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to nontaxable exchanges) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 1401. SALES AND EXCHANGES OF CERTAIN BUSINESS INTERESTS.

"(a) NONRECOGNITION OF GAIN.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—If an equity or proprietary interest in any trade or business is sold by the taxpayer and, within the 2-year period beginning on the date of such sale, replacement property is purchased by the taxpayer, gain (if any) from such sale shall, at the election of the taxpayer, be recognized only to the extent that the taxpayer's sale price of such interest exceeds the cost to the taxpayer of such replacement property.

"(2) ELECTION.—The election under paragraph (1) shall be made by filing, not later than the last day prescribed by law (including extensions thereof) for filing the return of tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year in which the sale occurs, with the Secretary a statement (in such manner as the Secretary may by regulations prescribe) of such election.

"(b) DEFINITION OF REPLACEMENT PROPERTY.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of this section, the term 'replacement property' means any equity or proprietary interest in any trade or business which is a small business concern, as defined under the Small Business Act.

"(2) TIME FOR DETERMINING STATUS AS A SMALL BUSINESS CONCERN.—The determination of whether any equity or proprietary interest is an equity or proprietary interest in a small business concern shall be made at the time such interest is acquired by the taxpayer.

"(c) EXCHANGE TREATED AS SALE.—For purposes of this section, an exchange by the taxpayer of an equity or proprietary interest in any trade or business for other property shall be treated as a sale of such interest, and the acquisition of replacement property on the exchange of property shall be treated as a purchase of such replacement property.

"(d) LIMITATION ON STOCK SALES.—In the case of any equity or proprietary interest which is evidenced by stock, subsection (a) shall apply to the sale of such stock only if such sale would, if such stock had been purchased by the issuing corporation in such sale, be treated as a redemption within the meaning of paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of section 302(b), including the application of section 302(c).

"(e) REDUCTION OF BASIS.—Where the purchase of replacement property results under subsection (a) in the nonrecognition of gain on the sale of any equity or proprietary interest, the basis of such replacement property shall be reduced by an amount equal to the amount of gain not so recognized on the sale of such interest. Where the purchase of more than 1 replacement property is taken into account in the nonrecognition under subsection (a) of gain on the sale of such an interest, the preceding sentence shall be applied to each replacement property in the order in which such property is purchased.

"(f) STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—If the taxpayer during any taxable year sells any equity or proprietary interest at a gain, then—

"(1) the statutory period for the assessment of any deficiency attributable to any part of such gain shall not expire before the expiration of the 3-year period beginning on the date the Secretary is notified by the taxpayer (in such manner as the Secretary may by regulations prescribe) of—

"(A) the taxpayer's cost of purchasing replacement property which the taxpayer claims results in nonrecognition of any part of such gain,

"(B) the taxpayer's intention not to purchase replacement property within the 2-year period described in subsection (a), or

"(C) the failure by the taxpayer to purchase replacement property within such period; and

"(2) such deficiency may be assessed before the expiration of such 3-year period notwithstanding the provisions of any other law or rule of law which would otherwise prevent such assessment."

(b) TECHNICAL AMENDMENT.—Section 1223 of such Code (relating to holding period of property) is amended by redesignating paragraph (12) as paragraph (13) and by inserting after paragraph (11) the following new paragraph:

"(12) In determining the period for which the taxpayer has held replacement property the acquisition of which resulted under section 1041 in the nonrecognition of any part of the gain realized on the sale or exchange of an equity or proprietary interest, there shall be included the period for which such interest had been held as of the date of such sale or exchange."

"Sec. 1041. Sales and exchanges of certain business interests."

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to sales and exchanges after the date of the enactment of this Act, in taxable years ending after such date.

SEC. 4. INCREASE IN SMALL ISSUE EXEMPTION.

Section 3(b) of the Securities Act of 1933 (15 U.S.C. 77c(b)) is amended by striking out "$1,500,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$3,000,000".●

ERA RATIFICATION EXTENSION

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, extension of the ratification period for the equal rights amendment is an issue which will soon be considered here in the House. One of the reservations that has been expressed by some Members of Congress about extension is that a ratification period longer than 7 years would not provide the sort of contemporaneous consent that the Supreme Court has ruled is necessary for amending the Constitution.

Court rulings on this subject have made clear that by speaking of contemporaneous consent the court intended that amendments that were no longer relevant or for which there was no longer any need would not still be under consideration by the State legislatures.

In the case of the equal rights amendment, there can be no question of the continued vitality of the issue. The mere fact that tht ERA is capable of provoking such spirited debate throughout the country is evidence the amendment is not stale or dead. Poll after poll has shown that a majority of the American people continue to support the ERA. In fact, support for the amendment is on the upswing according to recent Gallup and Harris polls.

Further, the pressing need for an equal rights amendment is obvious to anyone who examines the status and salaries of women in the workforce or who studies continued discrimination in educational opportunity despite passage of title IX of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The fact of the matter is that we need the ERA. Piecemeal legislation and weak or vague court interpretations of existing sex discrimination statutes are inadequate. Once and for all we must provide constitutional recognition for equal rights of both women and men.

The Christian Science Monitor, in a recent editorial, explored the recent vote of the House Judiciary Committee to recommend extension of the ratification period until June 30, 1982. The article examines the need for a renewed effort on the part of all of us who support equality of opportunity to work for the ERA and for extension. I commend this editorial to the attention of my colleagues. The editorial follows:

ONE SMALL STEP FOR ERA

Supporters of the Equal Rights Amendment sorely needed a victory, and the House Judiciary Committee gave them one of sorts with their narrow 19 to 15 vote last week. What the committee did was to approve a resolution to extend by three years and three months the deadline for ratifying the proposed 27th amendment to the U.S. Constitution which would outlaw discrimination on the basis of sex. The battle is far from won, however.

The ERA forces must still convince the full House and the Senate, and indications are this may not be easy, particularly in the Senate. But after a string of recent defeats in state legislatures, the Judiciary Committee vote may give ERA supporters the boost needed to regain their campaign's lost momentum. The three-year extension, although less than the seven years ERA proponents had sought, nevertheless ought to provide sufficient time for getting the approval of the three more states needed for ratification.

Without a concerned push by supporters, however, the three-year extension could backfire and provide opponents with a new opportunity to convince legislatures to rescind their ratifications—as three already have done.

The Judiciary Committee rightly rejected a proposal to allow states to rescind their approval of ERA; the legality of such rescindings has been questioned.

Thus with a new Gallup Poll showing a majority of Americans—58 to 31 percent—favoring the ERA, it is incumbent upon supporters to step up their lobbying. The poll also indicated Americans are more evenly divided—43 to 40 percent—on whether to extend the ratification deadline. Supporters obviously will need to focus their heaviest artillery on the extension issue, since it seems doubtful that they can reach their goal by March 22.

ERA proponents ought to remind lawmakers that until the 18th Amendment, there was no deadline for ratifying amendments, and Congress began imposing limits then only to keep proposals no longer relevant from floating around endlessly. There can be little doubt that the need to constitutionally ensure equal rights for both sexes remains very much a live and relevant issue in 1978—as it will three years hence.●

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to the human rights violations documented by Amnesty International in their 1978 report.

As a member of the Ad Hoc Congressional Committee on Irish Affairs, I am most disturbed by this report and have joined my colleagues in calling attention to it by participating in this special order.

The case which follows is another example of the maltreatment of prisoners that exists in Castlereagh Prison in east Belfast, Northern Ireland.

I believe that this case and the others that have been inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will encourage all Members of Congress to support the need for hearings on the Irish conflict. This is one human rights issue that should not be forgotten.

Male, arrested 1977 and brought to the Newcastle RUC Station; later transferred to Bessbrook RUC Station. Alleged maltreatment in both detention centers. Detained for four days, then released without charge. Had a medical examination on arrival at the Newcastle RUC Station and also on arrival at Bessbrook RUC Station. During his detention at Bessbrook, he had medical examinations by two different doctors. He had a medical examination before he left the Newcastle RUC Station. No information regarding any medical examination before release from Bessbrook.

Maltreatment alleged: general beating, physically exhausting procedures, hairpulling, direct trauma to the head: karate chops on the back of his head. Threats.

Symptoms (immediate): nausea, unable to think, unable to sleep, pains all over but especially in the area of the 10th and 11th ribs. Alleges that when he received a karate chop on the back of his head he "saw stars". (Later): insomnia, fear, inability to work.

Medical report: On examinations by Dr. D2, No. 1 while still detained, No. 2 the day he was released from detention center and No. 3 six months later.

Signs: on first examination in detention center, was shivering and frightened. Was easily annoyed and obviously reactively depressed. B/p low, 100/60. Pulse normal. Had clinical signs of fracture of 10th and 11th ribs. A bruise mark over right buttock. A bruise on right back, but not necessarily new. Tenderness in the epigastric area. Urine contained albumen and acetone. Dr. D2 explained the albuminuria as orthostatic, provoked by a long time standing in erect posture with lordosis of the lumbar spine.

On second examination, the day he was released: had no albuminuria, but very shaky and had all the signs mentioned above.

On third examination, six months later: somewhat better, but still showed some mental disturbances. It should be added that Dr. D2 had known this man for 15 years before his detention and asserts that he had always been completely healthy and mentally normal.

Conclusion: There is consistency between alleged maltreatment and the signs. We would add that the proteinuria, as explained by Dr. D2, may also have been provoked by physically exhausting procedures such as those the patient alleged.

The complainant was examined by police doctor T2 and it would be of great value to compare the reports.●

TERROR SQUADS IN RHODESIA TARGET BLACK MODERATES

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, assassination squads trained in Angola by Soviet and Cuban military advisers for the so-called Patriotic Front, the coalition of two terrorist groups, the Zimbabwe African People's Union (ZAPU) led by Joshua Nkomo and the Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU) led by Robert Mugabe, have been sent into Rhodesia with the assignment of murdering the moderate black Rhodesian leaders who are supporting the "internal settlement" of transition to black majority rule. A captured terrorist from Nkomo's Zipra forces, Reuben Donga, 22, has provided details of the training provided by Soviet and Cuban officers at terrorist bases in Angola at several public news conferences. Among Donga's admitted deeds was the massacre of 17 unarmed black civilians in mid July.

That the two terrorist groups comprising the Patriotic Front were planning the murders of black Rhodesian moderates cannot be news to United Nations diplomats and personnel for the Patriotic Front's U.N. Liaison office at 211 E. 43rd Street, suite 902, New York, N.Y. 10017, has made certain that substantial numbers of copies of Zimbabwe News, ZANU's "official organ," have been distributed to Maoist and revolutionary bookstores across the United States and in the U.N.

The March–April, 1978, edition of Zimbabwe News carried the following headline and story on page 1:

WHY SITHOLE, MUZOREWA AND CHIRAU MUST DIE

Before these three stooges signed the * * * so-called "internal settlement," we of ZANU and ZAPU, which together comprise the Patriotic Front did all we could to warn them of the dangers of their doing so. We reminded Sithole, Muzorewa and Chirau * * * that what had made the settlers to shout 'majority rule,' 'one man one vote' was not on account of a change of heart. It was pain. It had taken bazookas, sub-machine guns, landmines etc. to bring them into the 20th Century. But they still needed more pounding before they could fully repent. Many more of them would have to die before they could shout, with feeling, 'Zimbabwe now,' 'No racial representation in parliament now,' 'No racial privilege and discrimination now,' 'All land to the tillers,' 'Socialism now.' You have to hit a racist settler in the groin and skull hard; very hard; very, very hard before you can get him to scream those words. That is what we proposed; that is what we have been doing and that is what we will continue to do till final victory.

But Sithole, Muzorewa and Chirau * * * would not listen. They quickly signed the 'Articles of Auction'—selling the seven million Zimbabweans to settler agents of imperialism and multi-national corporations. * * * The crimes Sithole, Muzorewa and Chirau committed by signing the treacherous covenant are so dastardly, they cry to heaven for revenge.

Had Sithole, Muzorewa and Chirau not joined the illegal regime. Smith would not have continued the war. They have allowed him to claim that he has 'broadened' his regime * * *. He has now sent them to the U.S., U.K., South Africa and elsewhere—as messengers in defence of the criminal minority rule. * * *

This is why we firmly hold to the view that Sithole, Muzorewa and Chirau will have to die. * * * The people's hand is long; and their memories are wrought in blood and their punishment is certain. So it is written, so let it be done.

The two terrorist groups have been open about their intention to continue using terrorism against the Rhodesian civilians, black and white, whom they are trying to conquer. In July 1976, at a Capitol Hill conference a ZANU representative was joined by a ZAPU spokesman in asserting that white Rhodesians owed a "blood debt" to the revolutionaries. More recently I attended a briefing for Members of Congress by Dr. T. Kangai and Mr. C. Ndlovu of the Patriotic Front in which they admitted that attacks on Rhodesian civilians was a part of the revolutionary strategy.

Nevertheless, this country's Ambassador to the United Nations, Andrew Young, remains committed to throwing U.S. support to these terrorist gangs led by committed Marxist-Leninists rather than to parties of the Rhodesian internal settlement. Ambassador Young's partisan support for the Patriotic Front terrorists was revealed in the second part of his interview with the French Socialist newspaper, Le Matin, when he offered his belief that the campaign of planned terrorism against missionaries and their families in Rhodesia could only have come from the Rhodesian government and not from the Marxist revolutionary forces of ZAPU and ZANU.

However, that same issue of Zimbabwe News printed an article by N. Shamuyarira, director of ZANU's Zimbabwe Institute, which denounces the missionary schools and religious training as an "attack on African culture." Especially blameworthy, according to this terrorist theoretician, is the fact that the missionary schools have educated many black Rhodesians. According to Shamuyarira, these educated black Rhodesians form a dangerous "elite." He continued:

> In comparison with other countries at the time of independence, the size of this elite is fairly large, and it exercises considerable influence on the population as a whole. Ninety per cent of the Zimbabwe elite were educated in Mission stations where they were indoctrinated with ideas of superiority and elitism. * * * The psychology of individualism and competition which is fertile ground for capitalism was also inculcated into the minds and thinking of young Africans.

The ZANU education director proposes that the mission school system will have to be ended in order to "produce an [educational] policy that will prepare citizens for life in a socialist Zimbabwe."

Both Nkomo and Mugabe agree that any Zimbabwe they control will be "socialist" in the Marxist-Leninist style, not the social democratic tradition. Zimbabwe News stated that "Zimbabweans have no apologies to make for comrade President Robert Mugabe's unashamed proclamation that ZANU is inspired by Marxist - Leninist - Mao - Tsetung thought." This Zimbabwe News editorial opened with a compliment from our Ambassador Andrew Young that "the trouble with Robert Mugabe is that he is thoroughly incorruptible." It continues in a typical "cult of personality" paean to Mugabe stating that Mugabe "stands for total and permanent struggle . . . permits no compromise of principle . . . spurns coexistence with imperialism or with its puppets." Actually, Mugabe represents not incorruptibility, but fanaticism and a blood lust for power.

As for captured terrorist Reuben Donga, he has been quite willing to provide Western newsmen with graphic demonstrations of the skills taught him by his Soviet and Cuban instructors. Donga's press statements have been extensively reported in the Daily Telegraph, published in London, but not in the U.S. media. Therefore, for the details on the "patriotic front" assassination plots against moderate leaders, I refer my colleagues to the following news items published on July 21–23, 1978:

TERRORIST TELLS OF PART IN MASSACRE

(By Hugh Davies)

A young Black terrorist captured by Rhodesian troops in an ambush last Saturday explained in graphic detail yesterday how he and a fellow gunman massacred 17 Blacks a week ago.

Reuben Donga, 22, said he had been taught how to shoot and bayonet his victims by Cuban instructors in Angola.

At a Press conference in Salisbury he was freed from his handcuffs while Special Branch detectives allowed him to demonstrate with his Russian-made AK automatic rifle how he had raked two mud huts packed with women and children.

He stood with his legs in an assault position and swung the rifle from right to left. "I was told that guerrillas were living there, drinking beer in the huts," he said. My friend and I were ordered to go and kill them."

They used tracer bullets to burn down one of the huts in which nine people were incinerated, he said. His companion was later shot dead by a Rhodesian soldier.

ANSWER TO YOUNG

Donga, who claimed to belong to Joshua Nkomo's Zipra forces, was paraded before a group of foreign correspondents by Rhodesia's Ministry of Information.

Officials said they were anxious to counter outside skepticism, particularly that expressed by Mr. Andrew Young, American Ambassador to the United Nations, about exactly who was responsible for the current wave of atrocities in Rhodesia.

Donga's manner was totally convincing as he explained how in the space of 16 months he was turned from a "bar boy" in the Park Lane Hotel, Salisbury, into what appeared to observers to be an indoctrinated Marxist prepared to kill on orders.

He kept on talking about "the masses," on whose behalf, he said, he was acting; and he claimed that his group were under orders to assassinate the four Black leaders in Salisbury—Chief Chirau, the Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole, Bishop Abel Muzorewa and Mr. James Chickerema, Vice president of the UANC.

Six of his companions, he said had reached Salisbury, although he was unable to give proof of this. He had been in the bush and out of touch with them, he claimed: Asked if there was an intention to kill Mr. Ian Smith, he replied: "No, His name was not mentioned."

AUTHENTIC RING

While this part of Donga's story seemed slightly implausible, his account of his recruitment into Zipra had a completely authenic ring.

He said he left his job in March last year to return to his home in Plumtree, 300 miles south west of Salisbury, and near the Botswana border. His mother was ill and he wanted to see her, he explained.

But guerrillas in the area persuaded him and two other men to accompany them on a bus which crossed the border into Botswana. Donga claimed that he was abducted.

Then they were moved by lorry to a camp in Zambia, where they stayed a week until soldiers he identified as Cubans arrived in lorries to take a large group of recruits into eastern Angola.

At a camp called Boma, near Luso in Angola's Moxloo Province, 150 miles west of the Zambia border, more Cubans awaited the party. Donga said he spent six months there undergoing "guerrillas training."

"Our instructors spoke English and taught us how to fire rifles and bayonet people. There was a lot of Cubans there in uniform. I would say about 1,000. I also saw Russians there. They taught me a lot of things. They said that there was no God. They said we were to kill Whites."

Donga spoke of being continually told about Europeans in Rhodesia sitting in bars and having large swimming pools.

MET NKOMO

Then he broke off and showed reporters how he was taught to lay grenades in a swimming pool, one at each corner with a string attached.

On his return to Zambia he said that he met Joshua Nkomo, who told him and his fellow recruits: "Now you have finished our training you must go and fight. Zimbabwe must be free."

Donga said that his final instructions were given to him and 11 others by Nikita Mangena, the Zipra commander who was killed by a bomb at the end of June. Zipra claimed at the time that he trod on a landmine.

But it is believed that Mangena was the victim of a feud within the guerrilla movement. A month before his death he was wounded in a gun attack believed to have been instigated by his rivals.

Donga said that apart from the rifle he was given only £2.28 in Rhodesian dollars and told to fend for himself. He robbed village stores of food and begged water from local people.

HOW CUBANS TRAINED ME FOR WAR

(By Hugh Davies)

A disturbing picture of Soviet and Cuban instructors in Angola are turning raw young recruits of Joshua Nkomo's Zipra forces into an effective guerrilla army was given this week by Reuben Donga, 22, a self-confessed terrorist killer of 21 black Rhodesians.

After he surrendered to troops in bushland near Sinoia, 60 miles east of Salisbury, he was held in a detention centre where I interviewed him over a period of five hours. Like the special branch detectives who guard him, I am convinced that he was truthfully recalling his guerrilla experience.

I have also interviewed his relatives, who, like the war-weary people of Rhodesia, for legal reasons cannot yet be told of his arrest or what has happened to him over the last 17 months. He is due to face charges of mass murder and a mandatory death sentence if convicted.

His life changed dramatically in February of the last year when he took a week's leave from his job in Salisbury as a bartender at the plush Park Lane Hotel. He had heard that his mother was ill at her kraal in Plumbtree, 300 miles away in Matabeleland, close to the Botswana border.

As he got off the bus at Plumbtree, he was approached by three men who identified themselves as Zipra guerrillas. As he recalled, they told him: "You must come with us. You are going to Botswana to join Joshua Nkomo." He claimed that he was unwilling, but that he had no choice.

The men picked up two other youths in the town and the six strong party crossed the border that night and walked 50 miles to Francistown, where they stayed at a small guerrilla camp for three weeks. Then with five other youths and 18 girls he was put aboard a civilian passenger plane at the town's airport and flown to Lusaka, where he was fed for a further three weeks at a Zipra transit camp at Nyampunda, just outside the Zambian capital.

He saw about 4,000 people in the camp, including Zambian soldiers who were wearing rice-fleck East German camouflage uniforms. He was given food but had to sleep in the open.

From there he was taken to a smaller holding camp known as "FC" which is reported to be about thirty miles North West of Lusaka on the road to Angola. The late Alfred Nikita Mangena, overall commander of Zipra until his recent death in an explosion, paraded a group of recruits and told them they were to commence training in Angola.

Donga said: "He said that Cubans would be teaching us. Then a large number of trucks arrived at the camp. I counted 55 of them. White men were with them. They wore green uniforms, and Mangena said they were the Cubans. There was one to each truck, apart from four of the vehicles which were packed with these soldiers. I believe the trucks were called Zilis, which I think is a Russian make."

With more than 2,000 fellow camp inmates, among them girls, Donga was put aboard the convoy which then slowly wound its way across the border to Boma township outside Luso in Moxico province, 150 miles inside Angola. The journey took six days.

Just beyond Boma, the trucks were driven past a guard post into a large complex of barracks, with a parade square, rifle range, hospital and large training area. From Donga's description, it appears to have been an old Portuguese army post. Many Cubans were based there, he said. He talked about "hundreds." He estimated that there were also about 80 Russian soldiers on the base.

For a week, nobody did anything except clean out dormitories and read Russian books printed in English, the language that was used throughout the training period. Then a strict daily routine was instigated.

Recruits were woken at 7 am for 20 minutes physical training. Guerrilla warfare instruction began at 8:30 am. The timetable for Donga's "Infantry Platoon Three" was rigid. Monday and Tuesday were reserved for bushcraft. They were taken out of the camp, given rifle-shaped pieces of wood and taught how to lie in concealed positions, crawl, crouch and run.

On Wednesday, the morning was reserved for intensive marching on the parade square. After lunch, his unit was moved to a hut for the "engineering class." This involved tuition in the placing of TNT and plastic explosives. With simple drawings on blackboards, recruits were shown how to blow up pipelines and railway links.

Demonstrations were given in the vicinity of the camp on an actual piece of railway line laid specially for the purpose of showing blasting techniques.

Thursday was always a morning and afternoon of pure politics. Cubans and Soviets alternated as teachers, and, according to Donga, the emphasis of both sides was on "black and white being equal." He said: "We learned the life of socialism and that there was no God. In Socialism Africans and Europeans are one. You live together, you work together, and everyone is paid the same, even the man who works on the roads."

Halfway through the training period, judo and karate were added to the timetable, and Donga was allowed to begin firing live rounds on the range.

It was shortly after this that he was singled out with 47 other young men for intensive guerrilla training. It appears that he showed a natural ability with the rifle.

Detectives who have interviewed him in Rhodesia have been impressed by his knowledge of rifles. On his arrest he was carrying a Russian-made 1976 model of the AKM, a sophisticated version of the AK47. He could strip and assemble the weapon in seconds.

In reconstructing the three killings he has been involved in this month, including a massacre of 17 blacks, among them women and children, he appears to have had no qualms about spraying his victims with up to 70 rounds of automatic fire. He recalls the murders almost with a sense of satisfaction of having been ordered to execute them, he said, by "the masses."

In rounding off his training, his instructors taught him bayoneting.

And his first bloody act after he was smuggled into Rhodesia two months ago was to bayonet an elderly man.

His training in Angola ended in November when Mr. Nkomo arrived at the camp in a helicopter from Lusaka. Donga remembers the day well.

"It was the time we became soldiers. Mr. Nkomo was dressed in army uniform and he stood on a platform alongside the Cubans and the Soviet commanders. An Angolan officer was also with them.

"Then we all marched past them, and Mr. Nkomo saluted us. I was very excited. He told us: 'Now you are soldiers. You have got to fight for Zimbabwe. You must try to be men. You must never retreat. You must never be captured.'

"He then shouted 'Zimbabwe Zi Zi—now you are free.' We all sang with him. He told us he was going to Luanda, and he got back into his helicopter."

The captured guerrilla added: "After that we had a party for two days. We had Coca-Cola, beer, and for the first time, nice rice and good soup. People got drunk. Nobody slept. The Cubans brought out drums and guitars and everybody sang.

"The Russians joined in. They were very happy, but a bit reserved. There were Cuban and Soviet girls there. The Cubans had a song called 'Angola, Angola.' The girls of the Soviet even danced with us. I will always remember that."

NKOMO GANG "SENT TO ASSASSINATE BLACK LEADERS"

(By Hugh Davies)

Six African terrorists including a Soviet-trained explosives expert were being hunted in Rhodesia last night after a warning that they had been briefed in Zambia to assassinate four black leaders in Salisbury.

The briefing was said to have been at a camp of the ZIPRA guerrilla followers of Mr. Nkomo, the Patriotic Front leader. The four "targets" were said to be:

Bishop Muzorewa; his two partners on Rhodesia's multiracial Executive Council, Chief Chirau and the Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole; and Mr. James Chikerema.

Mr. Chikerema is a vice-president of Bishop Muzorewa's United African National Council and was formerly deputy to Mr. Nkomo in the Zimbabwe African People's Union (ZANU) leadership.

Apparently 12 terrorists split into two units of six with a Soviet-trained man leading each unit. Security sources say all members of one unit have been accounted for. The other six terrorists may have reached Salisbury.

Sketchy details of the plot were first disclosed two days ago by Reuben Donga, 22, a Cuban-trained ZIPRA guerrilla who surrendered to troops after his companion was shot dead.

KILLER OF 21 PEOPLE

He confessed to killing 21 people, and although he faces a mandatory death sentence, he agreed to talk to foreign correspondents about his role in the Makanza massacre of Blacks a week ago.

He referred to his "mission" and gave names of the four "targets." Observers were skeptical, thinking he might have been trying to impress his all-White audience, but after extensive inquiries, I have ascertained that he was in a specially selected team of high-calibre guerrillas that left Zambia about seven weeks ago.

SMITH NOT ON LIST

All four "threatened" politicians are normally heavily guarded, and it is not thought extra precautions are being taken. But Special Branch detectives are taking the threat very seriously.

According to information collated by detectives, the team was told to leave Mr. Ian Smith, Prime Minister, alone.

One theory is that Mr. Nkomo wants to deal directly with Mr. Smith at a settlement conference. Mr. Smith has denied he would go to a peace conference without his black partners.

Yesterday, Bishop Muzorewa was still in America, and Mr. Sithole was traveling in Europe. The other two politicians mentioned were in Salisbury.

Ten men were briefed at "FC," a ZIPRA camp near Lusaka, by two of Mr. Nkomo's henchmen, Nikita Mangena, then ZIPRA forces leader, and Enoch Tsongani, his head of operations, told them they would be smuggled into Rhodesia specifically to kill the four politicians.●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Friday, July 28, 1978

The House met at 10 a.m.

Father John J. McMahon, St. Theresa's Church, Phoenix, Ariz., offered the following prayer:

Lord God, thank You for the gift of a new day, full of potential, with opportunities for service and love. Forgive us for time wasted yesterday. May we use this day wisely and well. In our busy world of papers and speeches, may we not forget You, the Creator and Giver of time.

Lord, bless these Congressmen and all those who have been entrusted with the Government of our country. May they always be loving, caring people. May love—true love—bounce off the walls of their hearts and off the walls of this august Chamber. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

There was no objection.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Chirdon, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2777) entitled "An act to provide for consumers a further means of minimizing the impact of inflation and economic depression by narrowing the price spread between costs to the producer and the consumer of needed goods, services, facilities, and commodities through the development and funding of specialized credit sources for, and technical assistance to, self-help, not-for-profit cooperatives, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R.

12426) entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide financial assistance for the city of New York."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to an amendment of the House to a joint resolution of the Senate of the following title:

S.J. Res. 102. Joint resolution, American Indian religious freedom.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 to a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 11832. An act to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 under the Arms Control and Disarmament Act.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 3075. An act to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act, and for other purposes.

The message also announced a change of conferee: Mr. SCHMITT was appointed to replace Mr. GARN as a conferee on S. 3084, proposed Housing and Community Development Amendments of 1978.

FATHER JOHN McMAHON

(Mr. RUDD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks).

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, it has been our great privilege to welcome in our midst today for the purpose of opening this session with prayer, Father John McMahon from my congressional district in Phoenix, Ariz., and pastor of St. Theresa's Parish.

Father McMahon has been a servant of the Lord in Arizona for just over 30 years.

He is a priest who constantly uplifts the spirit and the faith of those he touches in his daily work, which in addition to his parish duties includes charity and community development work that benefits thousands of Arizonans.

I am proud to know Father McMahon as my pastor and my friend.

Father McMahon was born in Cavan County, Ireland, and spent his young years working the land on his family's farm. He entered St. Patrick's Minor Seminary in Cavan Town as soon as his age would permit.

John McMahon was an energetic youth, and played on St. Patrick's football team. In between chores, a 10-mile bicycle ride one way, and long hours of study, he charted a course for a life of service.

He graduated to St. Patrick's College at Carlow, and his studies there led to ordination as a priest on June 13, 1948. While at the college in Ireland, Father John learned of the need for priests in Tucson, Ariz.—then a small town situated in the Sonoran Desert shared by the United States and Mexico.

The Diocese of Tucson, as we might guess, was about as foreign a place as one could find from the Emerald Isle. But on December 10, 1948, Father John arrived and helped to build the new St. Cyril's Parish.

He excelled as an assistant pastor at St. Cyril's, and the church so liked his work that they sent him back to Ireland to recruit more workers for the Southwest.

In 1957, Father John was appointed founding pastor of St. Philip's in Payson, Ariz., rim country northeast of Phoenix. Even today, Payson boasts only 2,900 souls. When Father McMahon arrived there 21 years ago, there was no church building in which to conduct mass, so he held forth under the pines. Little more than a year later, he said his first mass in a beautiful new church with funds raised across the country.

Father John again received travel orders from the bishop, to become pastor of St. Mary's in Chandler. Following the successful planning and fund drive for a new church there, he was again reassigned in 1968 as pastor of St. Theresa's, where he has eliminated a quarter-million-dollar debt and established a strong and vital parish.

Father McMahon has served on numerous boards and committees for the betterment of life in Arizona, for which he has received help, praise, and awards from organization after organization.

Those of us who have been fortunate enough to know him during his 30 years in Arizona have come to expect—with no warning—a phone call late at night or early in the morning, asking after a parishioner's health in the most beautiful of brogues as an introduction to enlistment in yet another of his ambitious and beneficial projects.

His spirit, his enthusiasm, his honest and benevolent concern for others make it a pleasure and a privilege to say, "Of course, Father McMahon, what may I do to help?" And Father McMahon never lacks an answer.

Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to have in our midst this man of God who has given so generously of himself for the betterment of so very many people. Let us wish him many more years of success in his good works.

I thank the House for receiving him.

FLOOR REMARKS OF THE HONORABLE CARROLL HUBBARD ON THE NEED FOR A SUBSTANTIAL TAX CUT

(Mr. HUBBARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, the taxpayers of the First Congressional District of the Commonwealth of Kentucky have sent a message, and that message is clear. My constituents want a substantial cut in Federal taxes, and they want a substantial cut in Federal spending to match that cut in taxes. In a questionnaire I recently sent to the citizens of Kentucky, I asked, "Understanding that reduced Federal taxes cause reduced Federal services, do you favor or oppose a substantial Federal income tax cut?" With 10,000 responses tallied, 83 percent favor an income tax cut, and only 17 percent oppose such a cut in taxes and Federal services. The message is, indeed, clear.

We now have a system that allows a combination of inflation and the progressive tax structure to gouge the American taxpayer with ever-increasing severity. We have a system that discourages increased production. The current failure of the Congress and the White House to provide significant tax relief is unconscionable in both economic and social terms. A current proposal before the House Ways and Means Committee to abandon proposals for tax reductions and simply extend tax measures which are to expire at the end of this year is blind to an out-of-control upward surge in tax rates and an impending reduction in the gross national product, jobs and real wages.

After a careful study of the various proposals for a significant tax cut, I have reached the conclusion that the best bill offered so far is the one by Representative JACK KEMP and Senator WILLIAM ROTH, which would cut more than $100 billion from Federal revenues in 3 years. It appears to me that the only way to reduce the growth of the Federal Government is to reduce the level of revenues available to the Government. It also appears that the current level of taxation is a burden upon our economy, and that Kemp-Roth will result in a healthier and more vibrant economy.

WAS YESTERDAY'S WORK ON TAX BILL TIME WASTED?

(Mr. VANIK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, this morning in our prayer it was requested that we be forgiven our waste of yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, last evening a coalition of all of the Republicans and 13 of the 25 Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means reported out a tax bill that would have thrilled Andrew Mellon. The bill is heavily tilted in favor of the upper crust. The average taxpayer will receive a few bare bones from the banquet table.

Mr. Speaker, I opposed the bill. I have no pride in it. As far as the average taxpayer is concerned, the bill is a sham tax cut.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 12255, COMPREHENSIVE OLDER AMERICANS ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1978

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 12255) to amend the Older Americans Act of 1965 to provide for improved programs for older persons, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. PERKINS, BRADEMAS, BEARD of Rhode Island, MILLER of California, KILDEE, HEFTEL, HAWKINS, BIAGGI, QUIE, JEFFORDS, and PRESSLER.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 2777, NATIONAL CONSUMER COOPERATIVE BANK ACT

Ms. OAKAR filed the following conference report and statement on the bill (H.R. 2777) to provide for consumers a further means of minimizing the impact of inflation and economic depression by narrowing the price spread between costs to the producer and the consumer of needed goods, services, facilities, and commodities through the development and funding of specialized credit sources for, and technical assistance to, self-help, not-for-profit cooperatives, and for other purposes:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. 95-1399)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2777) to provide for consumers a further means of minimizing the impact of inflation and economic depression by narrowing the price spread between costs to the producer and the consumer of needed goods, services, facilities, and commodities through the development and funding of specialized credit sources for, and technical assistance to, self-help, not-for-profit cooperatives, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "National Consumer Cooperative Bank Act".

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. The economic and financial structure of this country in combination with the Nation's natural resources and the productivity of the American people has produced one of the highest average standards of living in the world. However, the Nation has been experiencing inflation and unemployment together with an increasing gap between producers' prices and consumers' purchasing power. This has resulted in a growing number of our citizens, especially the elderly, the poor, and the inner city resident, being unable to share in the fruits of our Nation's highly efficient economic system. The Congress finds that user-owned cooperatives are a proven method for broadening ownership and control of the economic organizations, increasing the number of market participants, narrowing price spreads, raising the quality of goods and services available to their membership, and building bridges between producers and consumers, and their members and patrons. The Congress also finds that consumer and other types of self-help cooperatives have been hampered in their formation and growth by lack of access to adequate cooperative credit facilities and lack of technical assistance. Therefore, the Congress finds a need for the establishment of a National Consumer Cooperative Bank which will make available necessary financial and technical assistance to cooperative self-help endeavors as a means of strengthening the Nation's economy.

TITLE I—NATIONAL CONSUMER COOPERATIVE BANK

CREATION AND CHARTER OF BANK

SEC. 101. There is hereby created and chartered a body corporate, the National Consumer Cooperative Bank, hereinafter referred to as the "Bank", as an instrumentality of the United States, and until otherwise provided, shall be a mixed ownership Government corporation. The Bank shall have perpetual existence unless and until its charter is revoked or modified by Act of Congress. The right to revise, amend, or modify the charter of the Bank is specifically and exclusively reserved to the Congress. The principal office of the Bank shall be in Washington, District of Columbia, and, for the purpose of venue, shall be considered a resident thereof. It shall make loans and offer its services throughout the United States, its territories and possessions, and in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. The Bank shall—

(1) encourage the development of new and existing cooperatives eligible for its assistance by providing specialized credit and technical assistance;

(2) maintain broad-based control of the Bank by its voting stockholders;

(3) encourage broad-based ownership, control, and active participation by members in eligible cooperatives;

(4) assist in improving the quality and availability of goods and services to consumers; and

(5) encourage ownership of its equity securities by cooperatives and others as provided in section 104, so that the date when all of the Bank's class A stock owned by the United States has been fully redeemed (the "Final Government Equity Redemption Date") occurs as early as practicable.

GENERAL CORPORATE POWERS

SEC. 102. The Bank shall have the power to make and service loans, commitments for credit, guarantees, furnish financially related services, technical assistance and the results of research, issue its obligations within the limitations imposed by section 107 in such amounts, at such times, and on such terms as the Bank may determine, and to exercise the other powers and duties prescribed in this Act, and shall have the power to—

(1) operate under the direction of its Board of Directors;

(2) adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal, which shall be judicially noted;

(3) elect by its Board of Directors a president, one or more vice president, a secretary, a treasurer, and provide for such other officers, employees, and agents as may be necessary, and define their duties in accordance with regulations and standards adopted by the Board, and require surety bonds or make other provisions against losses occasioned by acts of employees;

(4) prescribe by its Board of Directors its bylaws not inconsistent with law, which shall establish the terms of office and the procedure for election of elective members; provide in a manner not inconsistent with this Act for the classes of its stock and the manner in which its stock shall be issued, transferred, and retired; and prescribe the manner in which its officers, employees, and agents are elected or selected, its property acquired, held and transferred, its loans, commitments, other financial assistance, guarantees and appraisals may be made, its general business conducted, and the privilege granted it by law exercised and enjoyed;

(5) enter into contracts and make advance, progress, or other payments with respect to such contracts, without regard to the provisions of section 3648 of the Revised Statutes;

(6) sue and be sued in its corporate name and complain and defend, in any court of competent jurisdiction, State or Federal;

(7) acquire, hold, lease, mortgage, or dispose of, at public or private sale, real and personal property and sell or exchange any securities or obligations, and otherwise exercise all the usual incidents of ownership of property necessary or convenient to its business: Provided, That any such acquisition or ownership of real property shall not deprive a State or political subdivision thereof of its civil or criminal jurisdiction in and over such property or impair the civil rights of the inhabitants of such property under Federal, State, or local laws;

(8) obtain insurance against loss in connection with property and other assets;

(9) modify or consent to the modification with respect to the rate of interest, time of payment of any installment of principal or interest, security, or any other term of any contract or agreement to which it is a party or has an interest pursuant to this Act;

(10) utilize and act through any Federal, State, or local public agency or instrumentality, or private agency or organization, with the consent of the agency or organization concerned, and contract with such agency, instrumentality, or organization for furnishing or receiving technical services and benefits of research services, funds or facilities; and make advance, progress, or other payments with respect to such contracts without regard to section 3648 of the Revised Statutes;

(11) within the limitations of section 107, borrow money and issue notes, bonds and debentures or other obligations individually or in concert with other financial institutions, agencies or instrumentalities, of such character and such terms and conditions and at rates of interest as may be determined;

(12) issue certificates of indebtedness to its stockholders or members and pay interest on funds left with the Bank, and accept grants or interest free temporary use of funds made available to it;

(13) participate with one or more other financial institutions, agencies, instrumentalities, or foundations in loans or guarantees under this Act on terms as may be agreed upon;

(14) accept guarantees from other agencies for which loans made by the Bank may be eligible;

(15) establish one or more branch offices and one or more advisory councils in connection with any such branch offices, as may from time to time be authorized by the Board of Directors;

(16) buy and sell obligations of, or insured by, the United States or any agency or instrumentalities thereof, or securities backed by the full faith and credit of any such agency or instrumentality and, after the final Government Equity Redemption Date, make such other investments as may be authorized by the Board of Directors;

(17) approve the salary scale of officers and employees of the Bank, in accordance with regulations and standards adopted by the Board of Directors, without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates, but, except as otherwise provided in this Act, the General Schedule pay rates shall be applicable until all class A stock held by the Secretary of the Treasury has been retired; and

(18) have such other incidental powers as may be necessary or expedient to carry out its duties under this Act.

The stock or other securities or instruments issued by the Bank shall, to the same extent as securities which are the direct obligations of the United States, be "exempt securities" within the meaning of the laws administered by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS

SEC. 103. (a) The Bank shall be governed by a Board of Directors (hereinafter referred to as the "Board" which shall consist of thirteen members. Subject to the provisions of subsection (b) of this section, all members of the Board shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, for terms of three years or until their successors have been appointed and qualified. The President shall appoint seven members of the Board from among the officers of the agencies and departments of the United States Government: Provided, That at any one time no more than one member shall be from any one agency or department. The remaining members shall be from the general public (and not from the officers or employees of the United States Government) but shall have extensive experience in the cooperative field representative of the following classes of cooperatives: (1) housing, (2) consumer goods, (3) low-income cooperatives, (4) consumer services, and (5) all other eligible cooperatives, and for these appointments the President shall consider nominees submitted by national associations of cooperatives. Any member appointed by the President may be removed at any time with or without cause by the President. If a vacancy occurs on the Board for any reason other than a resignation pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, a new member shall be appointed by the President to serve until the next annual meeting of the Bank, at which time the vacancy shall be filled for the remainder of the unexpired term by the President or the holders of class B and class C stock, as provided in this section 104.

(b) At the first annual meeting occurring after the time when the amount of paid-in capital of the Bank attributable to the shares of class B stock and class C stock equals or exceeds $3,000,000, three members of the Board appointed by the President from the general public shall resign. Similarly, when the amount of paid-in capital attributable to the shares of class B and class C stock equals or exceeds $10,000,000 the terms of the other three members appointed by the President from the general public shall terminate. An additional member of the Board designated by the President (who shall be a member who had been appointed by the President) shall resign at each of the annual meetings occurring after the time when the amount of paid-in capital attributable to the class B and class C stock equals or exceeds seven-thirteenths and eight-thirteenths of the total amount of paid-in capital of the Bank. As members of the Board resign in accordance with the foregoing provisions, the directorships vacated shall be deemed shareholder directorships and shall be filled by the holders of class B stock and class C stock in accordance with the provisions of subsection (c) of this section. Five remaining members of the Board appointed by the President shall resign on the Final Government Equity Redemption Date. Thereafter, one member of the Board shall continue to be appointed by the President from among proprietors of small business concerns, as defined under section 3 of the Small Business Act, which are manufacturers or retailers.

(c) At all elections of Directors by holders of class B stock and class C stock, nominations shall be made by the classes of eligible cooperatives specified in subsection (a). Vacant shareholder directorships shall be filled, whether by appointment or election, so that at any time when there are three or more shareholder directors on the board, there shall be at least one director representing each of the classes of housing cooperatives, low-income cooperatives, and consumer goods and services cooperatives. Each nominee for shareholder directorship of a particular class shall have at least three years experience as a director or senior officer in the class of cooperatives to be represented. No one class of cooperatives specified in subsection (a) shall be represented on the Board by more than three directors.

(d) When all five remaining members of the Board appointed by the President have resigned pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, their successors and the successors to shareholder directors shall thereafter be elected puruant to such rules as the Board may from time to time prescribe in the by-laws of the Bank.

(e) No director shall be eligible to be elected for more than two consecutive full three-year terms. No officer of the Bank shall be eligible to serve simultaneously as a director on the Board of the Bank. The Bank shall give adequate advance notice to all voting stockholders of nominees and of the procedures for nominating other candidates. Each voting stockholder shall make the information required in this paragraph available to its members.

(f) The Board shall annually elect from among its members a chairman and vice chairman and select a secretary who need not be a member. The Board shall establish the policies of the Bank governing its funding, lending, and other financial and technical assistance, and shall direct the management of the Bank.

(g) The Board shall meet at least quarterly. Its meeting shall be open to members or representatives of all eligible cooperatives and other eligible organizations, as observers only, and to persons or representatives of groups who identify their interest in the Bank and who are invited to attend a meeting, subject to such rules as the Board may establish for the conduct of such meetings. Those rules shall include the manner of giving notice of meetings, the procedure for the conduct of meetings, the manner of submitting topics for the agenda, the allocation of time of presentations, and debate. The chairman, when sustained by the majority of the Board present, may adjourn the open meeting into an executive session on motion of the chairman, any Board member, or at the request of any applicant, borrower, officer, or employee when the matter under discussion involves an application, a loan, a personnel action, or other matter which might tend to impinge on the right of privacy of any person.

(h) Members of the Board appointed by the President from among the officers of the agencies and departments of the United States Government shall not receive any additional compensation by virtue of their service on the Board. Until the Final Government Equity Redemption Date, members of the Board appointed by the President from among the general public or elected by the holders of the class B and class C stock shall (1) receive compensation at a rate equal to the daily equivalent of the rate prescribed for grade GS–18 under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, for each day that they are engaged in the performance of their duties on the Board, and (2) be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, in the same manner as persons employed intermittently in the Government service are allowed expenses under section 5703(b) of title 5, United States Code, for each day that they are away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance of their duties on the Board.

CAPITALIZATION

SEC. 104. (a) The capital of the Bank shall consist of capital subscribed by borrowers from the Bank, by cooperatives eligible to become borrowers, by organizations owned and controlled by such borrowers, by foundations, trust or charitable funds, by public bodies, and by the United States. Beginnning with the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, the United States shall purchase class A stock and for that fiscal year there are authorized to be appropriated $100,000,000 for such purposes, and there are authorized to be appropriated for the next four succeeding fiscal years an amount not to exceed $200,000,000 in the aggregate. Any amounts so authorized but not appropriated or not utilized to purchase such stock of the Bank in any such fiscal year is authorized to be appropriated or reappropriated and so used in subsequent fiscal years.

(b) The capital stock of the Bank shall include class A, class B, and class C stock and such other classes with such rights, powers, privileges, and preferences of the separate classes as may be specified, not inconsistent with law, in the bylaws of the Bank. Class A preferred stock held by the United States shall be a preferred stock with first preference with respect to assets and dividends over all other classes of stock issued by the Bank. So long as any class A stock is outstanding, the Bank shall not pay any dividend on any other class of stock at a rate greater than the statutory dividend payable on the class A stock. Class B and class C stock shall be common stock with voting rights as provided for herein and shall be issued only to eligible borrowers and organizations controlled by such borrowers or organizations eligible to borrow, and shall be transferable only on the books of the Bank and then only to another eligible borrower. No holder of voting stock of the Bank shall be entitled to more than one vote regardless of the number of shares of stock of other classes held, except as provided in subsection (g) of this section.

(c) Class A stock with a par value of $100 per share shall be issued by the Bank to the Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the United States in exchange for capital furnished pursuant to subsection (a) of this section. The holder of class A stock shall be entitled to dividends at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury taking into consideration the average market yield, during the month preceding the close of each fiscal year, on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturity: Provided, That until October 1, 1990, such dividends shall not exceed 25 per centum of gross revenues for the year less necessary operating expenses, including a reserve for possible losses. Such dividends shall be payable annually into miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury and shall be cumulative. Any such dividend payment may be deferred by the Board of Directors with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, but any dividend payment so deferred shall bear interest at the same rate as the rate at which dividends accumulate on the class

A stock. Without the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Bank shall not pay any dividend or distribution on, or make any redemption or repurchase of, any other class of stock at any time when the cumulative dividends on the class A stock shall not have been paid in full (together with any unpaid interest thereon). Upon any liquidation or dissolution of the Bank, the holder of class A stock shall be entitled to receive out of the assets of the Bank available for distribution to its stockholders, prior to any payment to the holders of any other class of stock of the Bank, an amount not less than the aggregate par value of all class A stock outstanding, plus all accrued and unpaid dividends accrued thereon to and including the date of payment (together with all unpaid interest thereon). The class A stock be redeemed and retired as soon as practicable consistent with the purposes of this Act (such redemption to be at a price equal to the par value of the class A stock so redeemed plus cumulative dividends accrued thereon to the date of redemption): Provided, That beginning on October 1, 1990, there shall be redeemed as a minimum with respect to each fiscal year a number of shares of class A stock having an aggregate par value equal to the aggregate consideration received by the Bank for the issue of its class B and class C stock during that fiscal year. Each such redemption shall take place not later than ninety days after the close of each fiscal year.

(d) Class B stock shall be held only by recipients of loans under section 105 of this Act, and such borrowers shall be required to own class B stock in an amount not less than 1 per centum of the face amount of the loan at the time the loan is made. Such borrowers may be required by the Bank to own additional class B or class C stock at the time the loan is made, but not to exceed an amount equal to 10 per centum of the face amount of the loan, or from time to time, as the Bank may determine. Such additional stock ownership requirements may be on the basis of the face amount of the loan, the outstanding balances, or on a percentage of interest payable during any year or any quarter thereof, as the Bank may determine will provide adequate capital for the operation of the Bank and equitable ownership thereof among borrowers.

(e) Class C stock shall be available for purchase and shall be held only by borrowers or by organizations eligible to borrow under section 105 of this Act or by organizations controlled by such borrowers, and shall be entitled to dividends in the manner specified in the bylaws of the Bank. Such dividends shall be payable only from income, and, until all class A stock has been retired, the rate of such dividends shall not exceed the rate of the statutory dividend on class A stock.

(f) Nonvoting stock of other classifications and other priorities may be issued at the discretion of the Board, to other investors, except that so long as any class A stock is outstanding, the Board shall not authorize or issue any class of stock, whether voting or nonvoting, that would rank prior or equal to the class A stock as to dividends or upon liquidation or dissolution.

(g)(1) The bylaws of the Bank may provide for more than one vote on the basis of—

(A) the amount of class B stock, class C stock, or both classes held, with such limitations as will encourage investments in class C stock;

(B) the amount of patronage of the Bank; and

(C) number of members in the cooperative.

(2) Such bylaws shall avoid—

(A) voting control of the Bank from becoming concentrated with the larger affluent or smaller less affluent organizations;

(B) a disproportionately larger vote in one or more of the groups of cooperatives referred to in section 103(c) of this Act; and

(C) the concentration of more than 5 per centum of the total voting control in any one class B or class C stockholder.

(h) The Bank may accept nonreturnable capital contributions on which no interest, dividend, or patronage refund shall be payable from associations, foundations, or funds or public bodies or agencies at the discretion of the Board. For the purpose of accepting such contributions, the Bank will be a governmental unit within the meaning of section 170(b)(1)(A)(v) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

(i) After payment of all operating expenses of the Bank, including interest on its obligations, and after setting aside appropriate funds for reserves for losses, for cumulative dividends on class A stock and dividends on class C stock and for any redemption of class A stock in accordance with subsection (c), the Bank shall annually set aside the remaining earnings of the Bank for patronage refunds in the form of class B or C stock or allocated surplus in accordance with the bylaws of the Bank. After ten years from the date of issue of any such stock, or at such earlier time as all the Government-held stock is retired, patronage refunds may be made in cash, or partly in stock and partly in cash.

ELIGIBILITY

SEC. 105. (a) For the purpose of all titles of this Act, subject to the limitations of subsection (d) of this section, an eligible cooperative is an organization chartered or operated on a cooperative, not-for-profit basis for producing or furnishing goods, services or facilities, primarily for the benefit of its members or voting stockholders who are ultimate consumers of such goods, services, or facilities, or a legally chartered entity entirely owned and controlled by any such organization or organizations, if it—

(1) makes such goods, services or facilities directly or indirectly available to its members or voting stockholders on a not-for-profit basis;

(2) does not pay dividends on voting stock or membership capital in excess of such percentage per annum as may be approved under the bylaws of the Bank;

(3) provides that its net savings shall be allocated or distributed to all members or patrons, in proportion to their patronage, or shall be retained for the actual or potential expansion of its services or the reduction of its charges to the patrons, or for such other purposes as may be authorized by its membership not inconsistent with its purposes;

(4) makes membership available on a voluntary basis, without any social, political, racial, or religious discrimination and without any discrimination on the basis of age, sex, or marital status, to all persons who can make use of its services and are willing to accept the responsibilities of membership, subject only to limitations under applicable Federal or State laws or regulations;

(5) in the case of primary cooperative organizations restricts its voting control to members or voting stockholders on a one vote per person basis and takes positive steps to insure economic democracy and maximum participation by members of the cooperative including the holding of annual meetings and, in the case of organizations owned by groups of cooperatives, provides positive protections to insure economic democracy; and

(6) is not a credit union, mutual savings bank, or mutual savings and loan association.

(b) No organization shall be ineligible because it produces, markets, or furnishes goods, services, or facilities on behalf of its members as primary producers, unless the dollar volume of loans made by the Bank to such organizations exceeds 10 per centum of the gross assets of the Bank.

(c) As used in this section, the term "net savings" means, for any period, the borrower's gross receipts, less the operating and other expenses deductible therefrom in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles, including, without limitation, contributions to allowable reserves, and after deducting the amounts of any dividends on its capital stock or other membership capital payable during, or within forty-five days after, the close of such period.

(d) An eligible cooperative which also has been determined to be eligible for credit assistance from the Rural Electrification Administration, the National Rural Utilities Cooperative Finance Corporation, the Rural Telephone Bank, the Banks for Cooperatives or other institutions of the Farm Credit System, or the Farmers Home Administration may receive the assistance authorized by this Act only (1) if the Bank determines that a request for assistance from any such source or sources has been rejected or denied solely because of the unavailability of funds from such source or sources, or (2) by agreement between the Bank and the agency or agencies involved.

(e) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, a credit union serving predominantly low-income members (as defined by the Administrator of the National Credit Union Administration) may receive technical assistance under title II.

ANNUAL MEETING

SEC. 106. The Bank shall hold an annual meeting of its stockholders which shall be open to the public. At least 30 days' advance notice of the time and place of the annual meeting shall be given to all stockholders. Borrowers from the Bank shall also give notice of the meeting to their members, who shall be entitled to attend. At such meeting the Bank shall give a full report of its activities during the year and its financial condition and may present proposals for future action and other matters of general concern to borrowers and organizations eligible to borrow from the Bank. Members and representatives of borrowers may present motions or resolutions relating to matters within the scope of this Act and may participate in the discussion thereof and other matters on the agenda.

BORROWING AUTHORITY

SEC. 107. (a) The Bank is authorized to obtain funds through the public or private sale of its bonds, debentures, notes, and other evidences of indebtedness. Such obligations shall be issued at such times, bear interest at such rates, and contain such terms and conditions as the Board shall determine after consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That the amount of such obligations which may be outstanding at any one time pursuant to this section shall not exceed ten times the paid-in capital and surplus of the Bank.

(b) The Bank is also authorized, but not required, and only so long as any of its class A stock is held by the Secretary of the Treasury, to issue its obligations to the Secretary of the Treasury, in amounts not to exceed in the aggregate such amounts as are provided in appropriations Acts and the Secretary of the Treasury may in his discretion purchase any such obligations. Each purchase of obligations of the Bank under this subsection shall be upon such terms and conditions as to yield a rate of return not less than a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturity. The Secretary of the Treasury may sell, upon such terms and conditions and at such price or prices as he shall determine any of the obligations of the Bank acquired by him under this subsection.

(c) The Bank may purchase its own obligations, and may provide for the sale of any such obligations through a fiscal agent or agents, by negotiation, offer, bid, syndicate sale, or otherwise, and may deliver such obligations by book entry, wire transfer, or such other means as may be appropriate.

(d) Obligations issued under this section shall not be guaranteed by the United States and shall not constitute a debt or obligation of the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof other than the Bank.

LENDING POWERS

SEC. 108. (a) The Bank may make loans and commitments for loans under this subsection to any organization determined by the Bank to be eligible under the provisions of section 105 of this Act, and may purchase or discount obligations of members of such organizations if the Bank, to the exclusion of all other persons, entities, agencies, or jurisdictions, also determines that the applicant has or will have a sound organizational and financial structure, income in excess of its operating costs and assets in excess of its obligations, and a reasonable expectation of a continuing demand for its production, goods, commodities, or services, or the use of its facilities, so that the loan will be fully repayable in accordance with its terms and conditions. Commencing on October 1, 1983, the Bank shall not make any loan to a cooperative for the purpose of financing the construction, ownership, acquisition, or improvement of any structure used primarily for residential purposes if, after giving effect to such loan, the aggregate amount of all loans outstanding for such purpose would exceed 30 per centum of the gross assets of the Bank. The Board of Directors shall use its best efforts to insure that at the end of each fiscal year of the Bank at least 35 per centum of its outstanding loans are to—

(1) cooperatives at least a majority of the members of which are low-income persons, and

(2) other cooperatives, if the proceeds of such loans are directly applied to finance a facility, activity, or service that the Board finds will be used predominantly by low-income persons.

The Board shall adopt and publish in the Federal Register rules defining the term "low-income persons" for purposes of this subsection. The criteria to be applied and the factors to be considered by the Bank in making loans, loan commitments, purchases, discounts, and guarantees shall include an assessment of the impact of the loan on existing small businesses in the eligible organizations' business territory. The criteria and factors shall be stated in rules of the Bank which shall be published and made available to applicants and, upon request, to any person or organization.

(b) Loans under this section shall be repayable in not more than forty years and, except for loans with final due date not longer than five years from the date of the loan, shall be amortized as to principal and interest. In setting the terms, rates, and charges, it shall be the objective of the Bank to provide the type of credit needed by eligible borrowers, at the lowest reasonable cost on a sound business basis, taking into account the cost of money to the Bank, necessary reserve and expenses of the Bank, and the technical and other assistance attributable to loans under this section made available by the Bank, but so long as the Bank makes loans from the proceeds of the sale of class A stock, the interest rate shall not be less than the rates generally prevailing in the area from other sources for loans for similar purposes and maturities, taking into consideration the cost to the borrower of required purchase of class B stock in the Bank. The loan terms may provide for interest rates to vary from time to time during the repayment period of the loan in accordance with the rates being charged by the Bank for new loans at such times. The proceeds of a loan under this subsection may be advanced by the borrower to its members or stockholders under circumstances described in the bylaws or rules of the Bank.

(c) Subject to section 102(13), the Bank may guarantee all or any part of the principal and interest of any loan made by any State or federally chartered lending institution to any borrower if such loan is to an organization that would be an eligible borrower from the Bank for a direct loan and is on terms and conditions (including the rate of interest) which would be permissible terms and conditions for such a direct loan. The Bank may impose a charge for any such guarantee. No loan may be guaranteed by the Bank if the income therefrom to the lender is excluded from such lender's gross income for purposes of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

(d) Any loan guaranteed under subsection (c) shall be assignable to the extent provided in the contract of guarantee as may be determined by the Bank. The guarantee shall be uncontestable, except for fraud or misrepresentation of which the holder had actual knowledge at the time he acquired the loan. The Bank in lieu of requiring such lender to service such guaranteed loan until final maturity or liquidation, may purchase the loan for the balance of the principal and accrued interest thereon without penalty, if it determines that (1) the liquidation of the loan would result in the insolvency of the borrower or deprive the borrower of assets essential to its continued operation, and (2) the loan will be repayable with revision of the loan rates, terms, or payment periods or other conditions not inconsistent with loans made by the Bank under subsection (a) of this section, which revisions the lender or other holder of such guaranteed loan is unwilling to make.

(e) As long as any of the class A stock of the Bank is held by the Secretary of the Treasury, the aggregate amount of commitments by the Bank to make or guarantee loans shall not exceed such amounts as may be specified in annual appropriation Acts.

TAXATION

SEC. 109. Until the Final Government Equity Redemption Date, but not thereafter, the Bank, including its franchise, capital reserves, surplus, mortgages, or other security holdings and income shall be exempt from taxation now or hereafter imposed by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority, but any real property held by the Bank shall be subject to any State, county, municipal, or local taxation to the same extent according to its value as other real property is taxed.

QUARTERS AND SPACE

SEC. 110. Until the Final Government Equity Redemption Date, space for the principal office and any branch offices of the Bank shall be provided by the General Services Administration. Thereafter, the Bank may lease, construct, or own quarters and provide for the space requirements of its principal and other offices.

REPORTS TO CONGRESS

SEC. 111. The Board of the Bank shall report annually to the appropriate committees of the Congress on the Bank's capital, operations, and financial condition and make recommendations for legislation needed to improve its services.

AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 112. In addition to appropriations specifically authorized in this Act, there are authorized to be appropriated $2,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for each of the two succeeding fiscal years, ending September 30, 1980, and September 30, 1981, such sums as may be necessary: Provided, That none of these appropriated sums shall be used to retire any indebtedness of the Bank incurred pursuant to section 107 of this Act. Any sums so appropriated shall remain available until expended.

APPEALS

SEC. 113. (a) If an application for assistance under this Act is denied in whole or in part, the applicant shall be informed within thirty days in writing of the reasons for the denial or restriction.

(b) Any applicant for assistance under this Act receiving notice of denial or restriction of the application may, within thirty days of receipt of such notice, request the Board of Directors to review the application and notice of denial or restriction for a determination of whether the action of the Bank was correctly within the terms of the Act, the regulations, and the policy of the Board. The Board shall consider the request for review at its next meeting and promptly inform the applicant of its determination and the reasons therefor.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

SEC. 114. The Board of Directors shall adopt and publish its own conflict of interest rules which shall be no less stringent in effect than the Federal Executive conflict of interest rules contained in Executive Order Numbered 11222 in prohibiting participation or action or the use of inside information for personal advantage on any matter involving a corporation, trust, partnership, or cooperative organization in which a board member, officer, or employee holds a substantial financial interest or holds a position as board member or senior officer, the activities of which organization might be relevant to, be competitive with, or be inconsistent with the objectives of any bank created under this Act. These rules shall require—

(1) each nominee for elected membership on the Board established under this Act to make public and file with the election official before the date of election a statement of his financial interest and position, if any, in such organizations; and

(2) each senior executive officer and appointed member of the Board to file with the appointing officer, before entering that office a statement of his financial interest and position, if any, in such organizations, which shall be available for inspection upon request.

The provisions of this section shall remain in effect until the Final Government Equity Redemption Date.

EXAMINATION AND AUDIT

SEC. 115. Until the stock of the Bank held by the United States has been fully retired, the operations of the Bank shall be examined annually under the direction of an agency or instrumentality of the Federal Government designated by the President, including the General Accounting Office, and reports of such examination shall be forwarded to the Congress. The President shall, no later than the date that 66⅔ per centum of the class A stock is held by others than the Secretary of the Treasury, establish an Office of Supervision and Audit which shall be responsible for audits and examinations of the Bank, shall assure that the objectives of this title are carried out, and shall review and comment on the bylaws of the Bank and the general policies of the Bank and shall make an annual report to the Congress.

TITLE II—OFFICE OF SELF-HELP DEVELOPMENT AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

ESTABLISHMENT

SEC. 201. (a) There is hereby established within the Bank an Office of Self-Help Development and Technical Assistance (hereinafter the "Office").

(b) The Office shall have a Director who shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall not be a member of the Board. Subject to review by the Board, the Director shall promulgate and publish in the Federal Register policies and procedures governing the operation of the Office.

AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 202. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Office $10,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for the next two succeeding fiscal years an aggregate amount not to exceed $65,000,000, for the purpose of making advances under section 203 of this Act. Any amounts appropriated to the Office shall be deposited by the Office in a separate account in the Bank (hereinafter the "Account"), and shall remain available until expended. Repayments of capital investment advances made pursuant to section 203(a) and interest supplement advances made pursuant to section 203(b) and payments of interest thereon pursuant to section 203(c) shall also be deposited in the Account. No other funds of the Bank shall be transferred into the Account. The Account shall be used by the Office only as authorized in section 203.

CAPITAL INVESTMENTS AND INTEREST SUPPLEMENTS

SEC. 203. (a) The Office may make a capital investment advance out of the Account to any eligible cooperative, either in conjunction with or without a loan if the Office determines that—

(1)(A) the applicant's initial or supplemental capital requirements exceeds its ability to obtain such capital through a loan under section 108 or from other sources; or

(B) the membership of the applicant is, or will consist, substantially, of low-income persons, as defined by the Board of Directors, or the applicant proposes to undertake to provide specialized goods, services, or facilities to serve their needs; and

(2) the applicant cannot obtain sufficient funds through a loan under section 108 or otherwise, and the applicant presents a plan which the Office determines will permit the replacement of a capital investment advance out of member equities within a period not to exceed thirty years.

(b) The Office may make advances out of the Account to pay all or part of the interest payable to the Bank or any other lender by an eligible cooperative applicant which the Office determines cannot pay a market rate of interest because it sells goods or services to, or provides facilities for the use of, persons of low income: Provided, That such advances will not exceed an amount equal to 4 per centum of the principal amount of the indebtedness of such applicant to the Bank or such other lender for any year in which the net income of the cooperative is insufficient to meet scheduled interest payments.

(c) Capital investment advances made by the Office pursuant to subsection (a) and interest supplement advances made by the Office pursuant to subsection (b) shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Board of Directors of the Bank, and the Board of Directors may authorize an interest rate applicable to such advances lower than the rate applicable to loans by the Bank pursuant to section 108.

ORGANIZATIONAL ASSISTANCE

SEC. 204. The Office shall make available information and services concerning the organization, financing, and management of cooperatives to best achieve the objectives of this Act and to best provide the means through which various types of goods, services, and facilities can be made available to members and patrons. The Office may enter into agreements with other agencies of Federal, State, and local governments, colleges and universities, foundations, or other organizations for the development and dissemination of such information, and services described in this title. The Office may make or accept grants or transfer of funds for such purposes.

INVESTIGATION AND REVENUES

SEC. 205. The Office may undertake investigations of new types of services which can more effectively be provided through cooperative not-for-profit organizations and make surveys of areas where the increased use of such organizations will contribute to the economic well-being of the community.

FINANCIAL ANALYSIS AND MARKET SURVEYS

SEC. 206. The Office may, at the request of any eligible cooperative, provide a financial analysis of the applicant's capital structure and needs and its cost of operations, survey the market for the goods or services the cooperative makes or desires to make available to its members or patrons or the users of its facilities.

DIRECTOR AND MANAGEMENT TRAINING AND ASSISTANCE

SEC. 207. The Office shall develop and make available, alone or in concert with other organizations, a program for training directors and staff of eligible cooperatives to improve their understanding of their responsibilities; the problems of and solution for effective and efficient operation of their organizations or cooperatives in general; and may by any means it deems appropriate, conduct membership studies, provide membership education programs, and programs for informing consumers and the general public of the advantages of cooperative action. Management supervision, review, and consultations shall be available from the Office to any eligible cooperative.

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

SEC. 208. The Office shall work closely with all United States Government agencies offering programs for which consumer cooperatives may be eligible to assure that information concerning all such programs is made available to eligible cooperatives.

AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 209. There are authorized to be appropriated to the Office $2,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for each of the two succeeding fiscal years, such sums as may be necessary for the administration of this title. Any sums so appropriated shall remain available until expended.

FEES FOR SERVICES

SEC. 210. The Office may make the technical assistance services under this title available for such fees as it may establish, except that such services as the Office may determine may be made available without charge to eligible cooperatives depending on the nature of the services or on ability to pay. Any fees collected shall be accounted for separately and be available for expenses of the Office.

TITLE III—GENERAL PROVISIONS

AMENDMENTS TO EXISTING LAW

SEC. 301. (a) Section 201 of the Government Corporation Control Act (31 U.S.C. 856) is amended by redesignating paragraph (6) the second time it appears therein as paragraph (7), by striking out "and" immediately before "(9)" and by inserting ", and (10) the National Consumer Cooperative Bank" immediately before the period at the end thereof.

(b) Section 302 of the Government Corporation Control Act (31 U.S.C. 867) is amended by striking out "or" before "the Federal Land Banks" and inserting immediately after "the Federal Land Banks," the following: "or the National Consumer Cooperative Bank,".

(c) The second sentence of subsection (d) of section 303 of the Government Corporation Control Act (31 U.S.C. 868(d)) is amended by inserting "National Consumer Cooperative Bank," immediately before "Rural Telephone Bank".

SEC. 302. Section 5315 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(122) President, National Consumer Cooperative Bank.

"(123) Director, Office of Self-Help Development and Technical Assistance, National Consumer Cooperative Bank.".

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOINT EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2777) to provide consumers a further means of minimizing the impact of inflation and economic depression by narrowing the price spread between costs to the producer and the consumer of needed goods, services, facilities, and commodities through the development and funding of specialized credit sources for, and technical assistance to, self-help, not-for-profit cooperatives, and for other purposes, submit the following joint statement to the House and the Senate in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the managers and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The Senate amendment struck out all of the House bill after the enacting clause and inserted a substitute text.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate with an amendment. Except for minor and nonsubstantive provisions, and technical, clarifying, and conforming changes, the following statement explains the differences between the House bill, the Senate amendment, and the substitute agreed to in conference.

GENERAL STATEMENT

Both the House and the Senate approved legislation which would establish a National Consumer Cooperative Bank as a mixed-ownership government corporation, a Self-Help Development Fund, and a technical assistance program to encourage the development of consumer cooperatives. President Carter and the Administration support the establishment of a National Consumer Cooperative Bank and the President included the program in his March 27 speech calling for a comprehensive national urban policy. That policy, he said, would: " . . . build a New Partnership involving all levels of government, the private sector, and neighborhood and voluntary organizations in a major effort to make America's cities better places in which to live and work."

Voluntary efforts, including the utilization of not-for-profit cooperatives, have played a vital role in the development of this nation. To further encourage this spirit of self-help and local initiative, the President supported the creation of an independent bank to assist consumer cooperatives. His proposal is incorporated in the legislation agreed to by the managers on the part of the House and the Senate.

RESOLUTION OF POINTS OF DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE HOUSE AND THE SENATE

The House and the Senate bills both provide authorization for the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase stock in the National Consumer Cooperative Bank, such purchases providing initial capitalization for the Bank—all capital to be repaid with interest by the cooperatives. The House provided an authorization for appropriation of $100,000,000 for such purchases for the Fiscal Year ending September 30, 1978 and for the next four succeeding fiscal years an amount not to exceed $400,000,000. The Senate provided an authorization of $100,000,000 for the Fiscal Year ending September 30, 1979 and up to $200,000,000 for the next four fiscal years. The House receded to the Senate amendment.

The House bill provided that the Bank would be operated by a thirteen-member Board of Directors. The initial members would be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Seven members would be chosen from among officers of nine specified Federal government agencies. Six members would be chosen from the public. After three years of operation the six non-government members would be elected by the voting stockholders of the Bank. When 66⅔ percent of the voting stock of the Bank is held by borrowers, six of the remaining seven members would be elected by the stockholders. The one remaining member would continue to be a Presidential appointee.

The Senate bill also provided for a thirteen-member Board of Directors, initially appointed by the President. Seven of the members would be chosen from among officers of Federal government agencies (no specification of agencies) with no one agency having more than one member. Six members would be chosen from the general public. When private capital in the Bank reaches $3 million, three of the public members would be elected by the stockholders. When private capital reaches $10 million, three more members would be elected by the stockholders. When seven-thirteenths of the paid-in capital of the Bank is borrower-owned, an additional member would be elected. When eight-thirteenths of the capital is privately owned, one more member would be elected. After all Treasury stock is retired four more members would be elected. The last Presidentially-appointed director would be chosen from among proprietors of small business concerns.

The House receded to the Senate amendment providing for the composition and selection of a Board of Directors of the Bank.

Both the House and the Senate authorized the Bank to obtain funds through the sale of bonds and other obligations in the private market. The House provided that such obligations could not exceed at any time ten times the paid-in capital and surplus of the Bank. The Senate provided that such obligations could not exceed five times paid-in capital and surplus. The Senate receded to the House position. This increased borrowing authority will facilitate the Bank's borrowing operations in the private market, hastening the day when the government's seed capital is fully retired. The borrowing authority, agreed to by the managers, is more comparable with that provided the majority of lending institutions created by the Federal Government in past years.

The House bill authorized, after seven years of operation, the establishment of four to twelve regional banks, each operated by a Board of Directors, each having capital stock as determined by the central Bank, and each having powers similar to the central Bank. The Senate bill contained no provision for the establishment of regional banks but did authorize the establishment of one or more branch offices to facilitate operations of the Bank. The House receded to the Senate amendment.

The House bill authorized an appropriation of $2 million for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978 and up to $30 million for the next succeeding fiscal years for administrative expenses of the Bank during the start-up phase. The Senate bill provided an authorization for $2 million for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979 and for each of the next two fiscal years such sums as may be necessary. The House receded to the Senate amendment.

Both bills established an office to administer the Self-Help Development Fund (to provide financial assistance for fledgling and low-income co-ops) and the Technical Assistance programs created by the legislation. The House bill would have created an Office of Consumer Cooperatives in a separate government agency—ACTION. The Senate bill established within the Bank an Office of Self-Help Development and Technical Assistance. The House receded to the Senate amendment.

The House bill authorized an appropriation of $10 million for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978 for deposit in the Self-Help Development Fund and up to an additional $240 million for the next four fiscal years. The Senate bill authorized $10 million for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979 and up to an additional $65 million for the next two fiscal years for deposit in the Fund. The House receded to the Senate amendment.

The House bill provided that all loans and guarantees of the Bank would be on budget. The Senate bill provided that, until all government capital was retired, the aggregate amount of the Bank's loans and guarantees could not exceed amounts specified in annual appropriation Acts. The House receded to the Senate amendments.

Both bills included provisions requiring retirement of the stock purchased by the Secretary of the Treasury. The House bill provided that beginning June 30, 1990 an amount equal to the purchases of class B (stock required to be purchased by borrowers from the Bank) would be retired annually. The Senate amendment required that beginning October 30, 1990, an amount equal to purchases of Class B and Class C (owned by eligible borrowers) stock be retired annually. The House receded to the Senate amendment.

The House and the Senate bills contained provisions specifying a formula to determine the dividends payable on the stock of the Bank. The House bill provided that Class A (Treasury) stock would be entitled to a dividend of the lesser of 25 per cent of the net income of the Bank or a rate based on the average annual interest rate on Treasury debt obligations during the previous fiscal year. Class B and C stock would also be entitled to a dividend at a rate determined by the Bank. The Senate amendment provided a dividend for Class A stock at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury taking into account the yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the U.S. of comparable maturity. The Senate further provided that Classes A and C would receive no dividends while dividends due Treasury stock were outstanding unless the Secretary of the Treasury approved. The House receded to the Senate amendment.

The House bill authorized the Bank to buy and sell obligations of, or insured by, the U.S. or any agency or instrumentality thereof or securities backed by the full faith and credit of any such agency or instrumentality and make any other investments authorized by the Board of Directors of the Bank. The Senate amendment limited the Bank to investments in obligations of, or insured by, the U.S. or its agencies or instrumentalities with purchases of other obligations being prohibited until after the government's capital was retired. The House receded to the Senate amendment.

The House bill contained no specific requirements for loans to different types of cooperatives. The Senate bill required the Board of Directors of the Bank to use its best efforts to assure that at least 35 per cent of all loans outstanding at the end of any fiscal year be to low-income cooperatives or cooperatives providing a service or facility to predominantly low-income persons. The House bill did require that housing cooperatives eligible for assistance from existing Federally-sponsored sources of credit would not be eligible for loans from the Bank unless the Bank determined that requests for assistance from those other sources had been denied. The Senate amendment limited (beginning on October 1, 1983) loans to residential housing cooperatives to 30 per cent of the gross assets of the Bank. The House receded to the Senate amendments in both these areas.

The House bill provided that cooperatives which produce, market, or furnish goods, services, or facilities for its members as primary producers (for example, handicraft co-ops in the Appalachian mountains) would not be ineligible unless the dollar volume of loans to such co-ops exceeded 10 per cent of the Bank's lending capacity. The Senate provided that such cooperatives would not be ineligible unless the dollar volume of loans to such co-ops exceeded 10 per cent of the Bank's gross assets. The House receded to the Senate amendment.

The House bill provided that organizations eligible to receive financial assistance from any existing Federally-sponsored credit sources for cooperatives would only be eligible if the Bank determined that requests for assistance from such sources had been rejected. The Senate bill provided that such cooperatives would only be eligible if the Bank determined that a request for assistance from the other source was denied for lack of funds or cases in which the Bank and the other source agree that the credit should be extended by the Bank. The House receded to the Senate amendment.

Both bills provide procedures to insure that the government has sufficient control over the Bank (by selecting members of the board of directors, by requiring consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury on debt offerings, and dividend rates, and through general oversight of the operations of the Bank) and that Treasury stock investments are retired at the earliest possible date. The House therefore receded to the Senate amendment with respect to the termination of authorities on December 31, 1982.

The House bill provided that the President shall designate an agency of the Federal Government to annually examine the operations of the Bank and forward such reports to the Congress. When two-thirds of the stock of the Bank is privately owned, the President would be authorized to establish an Office of Supervision and Audit to continue supervision of the operations of the Bank and to make annual report to the Congress. The Senate included among the agencies which the President could designate for the initial audits the General Accounting Office. The House had no similar designation. The House receded to the Senate amendment.

The House bill provided that credit unions were ineligible for any assistance provided by the Act. The Senate amendment prohibited loans to credit unions but authorized credit union participation in the technical assistance programs. The House receded to the Senate amendment.

CIVIL RIGHTS OF INSTITUTIONALIZED PERSONS

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 9400) to authorize actions for redress in cases involving deprivations of rights of institutionalized persons secured or protected by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER).

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 304, nays 4, answered "present" 1, not voting 123, as follows:

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 9400, with Mr. OBERSTAR in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee rose on Thursday, May 25, 1978, pending was the committee amendment in nature of a substitute which was open to amendment at any point.

Are there any further amendments to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time briefly to recapitulate for the committee where the committee stands on this legislation.

On May 1, Members will recall, we initially considered this legislation. On May 25 we considered it a second time but, on both occasions, we reached a late hour and, accordingly, the Committee rose.

This morning we should be able to complete the legislation without difficulty in my view.

I am aware that the gentleman from California (Mr. WIGGINS) has several amendments. We have discussed them with the gentleman from California, noting the time necessary to debate those amendments. As a result of these discussions, the differences between the committee and the gentleman have, in some instances, been resolved.

Also the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS) has two principle amendments he would like to offer.

On May 1, an important amendment which affected sentenced adult prisoners was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ERTEL) and agreed to. That amendment was later conditioned by the acceptance of another amendment offered on May 25 by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RAILSBACK) that affected the coverage of those prisoners.

Mr. Chairman, I now would like to recapitulate for the Members just what the bill does and its status.

The bill is actually a simple bill. It seeks to vindicate constitutional and Federal statutory rights of institutionalized persons who are, in a sense, not free in our society. These people who are institutionalized are juveniles, elderly, handicapped, mentally ill, mentally retarded, chronically ill, and some of them are prisoners. Coverage of sentenced prisoners, however, is limited by two prior amendments. The ability of the Attorney General to initiate such suits has been limited by virtue of the Ertel amendment, modified by the Railsback amendment, which provides that the courts must refer a petition or complaint to the U.S. Attorney General for his consideration prior to the initiation of the suit. He may not initiate such a case on his own without a referral from a court of a petition or complaint which raises an issue about illegal conditions in such an institution. We have left the intervention rights of the Attorney General in cases of sentenced prisoners as they exist in present practice under rule 24 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

Does this bill create some form of bureaucracy? Is it expensive? The answer is "No." If this bill were adopted, what the Department of Justice would ask for is two more attorneys' positions and one more clerk's position. The Bureau of the Budget and the Congressional Budget Office have estimated the cost of this bill to be $76,000. It is not the intention to create a bureaucracy. It is not the intention of this bill to create a new field of litigation, burdening the courts with further litigation. It is to enable the Attorney General in certain areas to initiate or intervene in civil suits, but before he does so, we have for the first time rationalized the system.

The Members know what the situation is. We have had Federal judges making substantial rulings regarding State institutions because of the denial of constitutional rights of inmates or prisoners. Under this bill the complaint should come to the Attorney General. He then should notify State authorities. He then should consult the State authorities. He ought to fully inform them—the State attorneys general, the Governors, and the superintendents of these institutions—and try to mitigate the complaint. As to a pattern or practice, we are not talking about individual cases; we are talking about a pattern or practices of the denial of constitutional and statutory rights, and abuses of people in these institutions. If negotiation fails, then the Attorney General will commence a suit. It also enables him, as he may now do, to intervene in ongoing suits.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. KASTENMEIER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Further than that—and this may be a confusing factor—we have provided in section 5 a method to diffuse the impact on the courts of all these 1,983 cases. That is to say, when an individual prisoner complains about the status of his confinement, these complaints end up in the Federal courts. Rather than make these all Federal cases, what we have done here—and this was originally suggested by Attorney General Levi in the past administration, and was offered to the bill by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RAILSBACK)—is say those matters should go back through a certified grievance procedure mechanism, and this procedure must be exhausted first before they come to Federal court. We have set up a system entirely voluntary in terms of the States. The States may not elect to subscribe to these guidelines at all. There is no compulsion for them to do so. But, I should note, it is the mood of the States to agree to grievance procedure mechanisms within their State institutions. We have patterned this on the California youth authority as a model. This is quite separate from the rest of the bill in terms of conception. Both of these, in fact, are designed, among other things, to channel matters which end up in litigation into other forums for resolution and also to vindicate the rights of Americans.

We are very concerned about human rights abroad. In years past we have vindicated through legislation the rights denied on account of race, and we will be asked to ratify, at least to extend consideration of an amendment affecting the constitutional rights on account of sex.

In conclusion, it is time that we protect this class of uniquely vulnerable citizens.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WIGGINS

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. WIGGINS: On Page 11, Line 23, strike out "prior to such time" and insert "at least 30 days previously".

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, to refresh the recollection of the Members, there are two basic circumstances under which the Attorney General can become involved in these actions affecting civil rights of institutionalized persons. In one case, the Attorney General, if the bill is enacted, may file an action directly in the name of the United States. That is a so-called section 2 action under the bill.

The other circumstance is that the Attorney General can intervene in an existing action. In either event, it is quite clear that the committee has been careful to see that the Attorney General consults with State agencies prior to becoming involved either in the form of a direct action or by way of intervention. In the case of a direct action, the Attorney General is required under the bill to certify that at least 30 days previously, that is, prior to his action, he has contacted the agencies of the State, has identified the pattern of practice of which he complains, has given the facts as he understands them, has provided a suggested solution and has offered the good offices of the Department of Justice to correct the problem, all in advance of filing the action.

Now, that is required under the present bill and must be done at least 30 days before the action is filed.

Why 30 days? Well, it is admittedly an arbitrary period, but its purpose is to provide an opportunity for the State to correct the condition without the necessity of a lawsuit.

In the case of an intervention, as distinguished from a direct action, the Attorney General must file a similar certificate, but that certificate need not be filed 30 days prior to the action, but merely must be filed, to use the language of the bill, "prior to such time;" that is, prior to the intervention.

Conceivably, therefore, there would not be an opportunity for the State to correct the condition which the Attorney General finds offensive, if the intervention is accomplished shortly after the State was advised of the intention of the Attorney General to intervene.

I find it inconsistent and wrong to require 30 days notice before the Attorney General can file an original action, but to not require any specific time before he can intervene. You see, it would be very easy, I fear, for the Attorney General to circumvent the careful procedures which we have required in the case of an original action if he can move directly into an existing action by intervention. There will always be cases out there in which the Attorney General can intervene if he chooses to do so.

So I think it is good policy, it is consistent with the proposal, if we attempt to impose upon the Attorney General the very same conditions for intervention that we impose upon him in the case of original action.

My amendment has that purpose. It deletes the language in the present bill, "prior to such time" and inserts the language found in section 3 "at least 30 days previously."

Again, the purpose of my amendment is to be constructive, to see that there is, in fact, time for the Attorney General to consult with the State and for the State to respond and, therefore, to avoid the litigation.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGINS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the purpose for which the gentleman has offered an amendment.

The gentleman has explained it very well. However, of course, there is a difference between section 3, initiating a suit, and section 4. Insofar as section 4 is concerned, the suit is ongoing. It is brought by a plaintiff or plaintiffs other than the Attorney General.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. WIGGINS) has expired.

(On request of Mr. KASTENMEIER, and by unanimous consent, Mr. WIGGINS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WIGGINS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. But, Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman's point that the Attorney General may proceed preemptively without adequate notice is a good one, and I want to assure the gentleman that "prior to such time," in terms of how we would have the Attorney General or the court construe such a phrase, means as much time prior to the filing by the Attorney General of a motion to intervene as is reasonable and proper.

We are not seeking confrontation or surprise. We are seeking other means of reconciling these difficulties in fact, this having been an ongoing suit. It is the intent of the requirement that the State officials be given meaningful notice—and that does not mean the day after tomorrow—prior to intervention. It means notice to which they can respond and perhaps in some other fashion, as I have suggested, reconcile what is in connection as far as the litigation is concerned.

It is only in extraordinary emergency situations that short notice would satisfy this requirement. Under the present practices we are well informed that the Attorney General is able to give substantial prior notice, and we intend that such practice would continue under this act.

Mr. WIGGINS. It is clear, Mr. Chairman, that the intention of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) is the same as my own. If the legislative history is clear that the Attorney General is to give the maximum notice possible under the circumstances, then that is my objective as well, and if the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RAILSBACK) concurs in the statements of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER), I will be pleased to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

(On request of Mr. RAILSBACK, and by unanimous consent, Mr. WIGGINS was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. RAILSBACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGINS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RAILSBACK. Mr. Chairman, I certainly agree with the statements of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER).

I might just mention that as part of the adopted amendment that I offered which was billed as a compromise between the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ERTEL) and myself, we did insert section 4 as a reference to the section 2 notice requirement, so that it is spelled out very specifically that there is required to be a certification of 30 days which was to be given just for prisoners.

Mr. WIGGINS. I understand. Mr. Chairman, in light of the legislative history and the agreement on both sides with respect to the meaning of the language, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to withdraw the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. KINDNESS

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows: On page 8, line 5, strike "on behalf of or" and insert "solely" in lieu thereof.

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to bring into focus a problem that exists in the definitions of this act, the definition, specifically, relating to "institutions."

The definition as it stands purports to include as an institution that would be covered under the act a facility such as, let us say, a mental institution or a psychiatric hospital where the State has contracted with that hospital, although it might be operated under private auspices, but the State has contracted with that hospital for the providing of services for patients under the care of the State.

However, the definition currently seems to go well beyond even that and into, let us say, a nursing home under private operation that does take medicare and medicaid cases, because there is a contractual relationship between the State, in administering the welfare function, and that nursing home.

So in place of the language which now says:

"institution" means any facility or institution which is owned, operated, or managed by or provides service on behalf of or pursuant to a contract with, any State or political subdivision of a State—

I would suggest that we need to narrow that language and refer to only such facility or institution which is owned, operated, or managed by or provides services solely pursuant to a contract with, any State or political subdivision of a State.

Some would say "solely" goes a little too far, that perhaps we should say "substantially" or some other such word. I would like to point out that the report of the committee, in relation to this part of the definitions, says:

if an institution, as defined under pargaraph B, provides services, in whole or in part on behalf of or pursuant to a contractual agreement—

That language in the report gives me quite a bit of concern, because it does seem to be saying, "yes, we are going to take into the definition of an institution a nursing home that may have one medicare patient in it under a contractual arrangement administered by the State."

The chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER), and I have discussed this in some detail, and if the chairman of the subcommittee would care to comment, I think there is need of at least clarifying the record in this regard. If it can be sufficiently clarified, I would suggest that I would ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment. But I am concerned with the state of the record at this point.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDNESS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the comment of the gentleman from Ohio. We have had, of course, an elaborate discussion in the past on State action. I think the gentleman knows that we do not intend for institutions that are essentially private in character to be usually reached, but we recognize that where there is a substantial referral by certain States in one form or another, perhaps other than by contract, to nonpublic facilities which would house a number of individuals, that private institution really acts in lieu of the State.

We have used the term "in whole or in part," but I would not want "in part" to refer, in terms of State action, to institutions that were accepting one or two or a small number of individuals under State control and many not under State control.

The entire bill is predicated on a pattern or practice which would affect a substantial number of individuals, and perhaps "substantial" might have been a better word; but in pursuing this, I would point out to the gentleman that we have made a conscientious decision not to include private facilities under the ordinary state of circumstances, that is to say, whether a private institution is licensed or inspected or whether the patients be recipients of medicare and medicaid at such institutions. That is clear; they are not covered solely because of these circumstances alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS) has expired.

(On request of Mr. KASTENMEIER and by unanimous consent Mr. KINDNESS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KINDNESS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Further, Mr. Chairman, the referral of one or two or a small number of individuals also would not probably constitute State action, for our purposes, because this contemplates a pattern or practice which would involve, in my estimation, a number of persons.

Mr. KINDNESS. Would the gentleman concur that in essence we are attempting to cover, under the definition of "institution" here, the type of situation where the State or local government may contract for a group of people to receive services rather than just for individual cases?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. I would agree with that, but there also are cases where the State does not, in fact, contract with a private contractor or institution, but uses other means to place large numbers of individuals in private institutions by referrals, by grants, and other State action, as in the famous case of Gary W. against Stewart, which resulted in the abuse of many, many children, young children, who were there because they were handicapped or retarded, the State action was reached in that case. We adopt a similar standard. We would not want in the bill to remove the State from responsibility, which was not done in the Gary W. case. However, on the other hand, we are not trying to reach those, say, incidental, occasional referrals of one or two or a very small number of persons.

Mr. KINDNESS. Would the gentleman concur or offer his interpretation of whether it is intended to bring within the coverage of the bill, as an "institution" within the definition on page 8, nursing homes in general?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS) has expired.

(On request of Mr. KASTENMEIER and by unanimous consent, Mr. KINDNESS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDNESS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman from Ohio restate his question.

Mr. KINDNESS. Yes. Is it the intention of the chairman of the subcommittee that the definition of "institution" should or should not bring within it, in general, nursing homes, although they may have medicare or medicaid patients in them?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. The answer is "no," an unequivocal no absent sufficient State action.

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for those views.

I would ask the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RAILSBACK) whether he would care to comment on that clarification.

Mr. RAILSBACK. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Chairman, I listened very carefully to the exchange the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS) had with the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER). I think, first of all, the gentleman raised a very legitimate and a very good point. However, I do think that the colloquy which the gentleman had with the gentleman from Wisconsin cleared up and pointed out that it is meant to be more than a single person. It is agreed that it was meant to be at least a group.

I note in the bill the reference in section 2 is to "subjecting persons" who are confined.

I think that what we really are trying to reach is that case where a State or a county has contracted out for substantial services to be performed by the private contractor.

Mr. KINDNESS. Would the gentleman agree that, in the absence of such a substantial group of services, we could hardly develop a pattern or practice prohibited under the bill?

Mr. RAILSBACK. Yes, I would.

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RAILSBACK) and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) for their comments.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the colloquy that has taken place, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Are their further amendments?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WIGGINS

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. WIGGINS: On page 12, after line 15, insert the following new subsections:

(2) that he or his designee has made a reasonable effort to consult with the Governor or chief executive officer and attorney general or chief legal officer of the appropriate State or political subdivision and the director of the institution, or their designees, regarding assistance which may be available from the United States and which he believes may assist in the correction of such pattern or practice of deprivations;

(3) that he is satisfied that the appropriate officials have had a reasonable time to develop a plan to correct such deprivations and have not adequately done so;

And redesignate subsection "(2)" on line 16 as subsection "4".

Mr. WIGGINS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, to understand the force and effect of this amendment, one must go back and repeat the fact that there are two ways in which the Attorney General gets involved. One is direct action, and the other is intervention.

In the case of direct action, the bill on page 9 and following details a complicated but specific procedure which the Attorney General must follow as a precondition of filing an action under this bill. The Attorney General must file a certificate at the time he files the action indicating that 30 days previously he has notified the Governor in writing, first of the alleged pattern or practice of deprivation of which he complains, and, second, he must notify the Governor of the supporting facts justifying that conclusion.

Third, the Attorney General must notify the Governor of the measures which the Attorney General believes will correct the pattern or practice. Fourth, he must make a reasonable effort to consult with the Governor or his representatives to correct the alleged pattern or practice. And, finally, he must certify that a reasonable time has passed, and that the pattern or practice has in fact not been corrected.

That is the procedure we require in the event of a direct action. Move now and compare that procedure with that required under section 4, in the case of intervention. In that case, the Attorney General must notify the Governor of the pattern or practice; he must notify him of the facts; and he must state what measures will correct the condition. But, carefully and specifically omitted is the requirement that the Attorney General consult with the Governor for the purpose of correcting the problem. In other words, there is a different procedure in the case of intervention than that which we carefully require in the case of direct action.

My amendment has as its purpose requiring that the Attorney General do all of those things in the case of intervention which the bill requires that he do in the event of an original action filed by him. Narrowly, it requires the Attorney General to do only two things additionally; namely, that he consult prior to intervening, and second, that he find that there has been a reasonable time for the State to correct the violation and it has failed to do so.

My opinion is that if those conditions are reasonable under section 3 of the bill, they are similarly reasonable under section 4 of the bill, and ought to be incorporated in that section. That is the effect of my amendment. I would hope that it would not be controversial, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGINS. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, we have considered this amendment. I might say, as the gentleman knows, that we constructed section 4 differently than section 3, and if I understand it, at least in these two respects, the two subsections conform with section 3.

Mr. WIGGINS. Exactly.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. I see no harm in it, although it should be pointed out that the certifications that the Attorney General makes are on his own judgment. He believes that, and he is satisfied that, the appropriate officials have had a reasonable time, and so forth. That is to say, it is a question of his judgment.

I might say he ought to take into account the rights of the primary plaintiff. I make the assumption that he shall not procure suits by third parties; that would not be proper, and carry on bona fide suits that have been instituted by the primary party, the plaintiff, and he must consider the rights of such persons.

With that in mind—and I have discussed this with the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RAILSBACK) on the other side—we are inclined to support the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. WIGGINS. I appreciate the gentleman's support. The circumstances of the parties is obviously a factor which the Attorney General should consider; that is, the impact of his motion to intervene upon ongoing litigation, and I expect that factor to be considered in terms of what is a reasonable time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. WIGGINS was allowed to proceed for 30 additional seconds.)

Mr. WIGGINS. If I may have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RAILSBACK), the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) has indicated support on the majority side for this amendment.

Mr. RAILSBACK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from California will yield, I believe the gentleman's amendment is a good one and is acceptable on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. WIGGINS).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. KINDNESS

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. KINDNESS: On page 12, beginning on line 24 through to line 9 on page 15, strike all of section 5.

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Chairman, section 5 of the bill provides that no later than 180 days after the date of enactment of this act the Attorney General shall put together the minimum standards for the development and implementation of a "plain, speedy, and effective system for the resolution of grievances of persons confined in any jail, prison, or other correctional or pretrial detention facility." The minimum standards point out, for the attention of Members, that these particular provisions for the minimum standards would have to include the participation of employees and inmates of correctional institutions in the formulation, implementation, and operation of the system. Some people would say that is a provision requiring the participation of inmates of the jails and prisons in running the jails and prisons. Some people would say that is rather outlandish. I would agree with them. That is perhaps the most objectionable part of these provisions. It goes on, however, to make specific maximum time limits within which written replies to grievances with reasons thereto at each decision level within the system would be required.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDNESS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, I do think there should be an understanding of the participation of the inmates and staff. What we intended—and it is incidentally our intention to agree to a further amendment to clarify that—is that this be an advisory role only. We tried to use the California Youth Authority as a model, even though they may have a somewhat greater role for prisoners and staff under that system than we have suggested here.

I call the gentleman's attention to page 28 of the report where it says:

The committee recognizes that the ultimate and only authority for the management of the institution rests with the administration and it is the committee's intent that the inmate involvement in the system pursuant to this standard be one of substance, but primarily advisory nature.

Mr. KINDNESS. Would the gentleman agree that a State or a local governmental unit operating a jail or prison can simply not ask for certification of its grievance procedure and thus not be involved? Is that correct?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. If the gentleman will yield, of course, that is correct.

Mr. KINDNESS. And the whole reason for this section being in the bill is a little obscure unless one looks beyond this bill and realizes that these minimum standards will be enforced by withholding of Federal funds either through LEAA or otherwise. Is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. If the gentleman will yield further, I would say there is nothing further from the truth. There is no implication of a State system having to adopt these and no penalty other than the fact that the State's grievance mechanism may not be recognized by the courts in a treatment of 1983 suits. There would be no further impact.

Mr. KINDNESS. So the only impact of this would be a possibility of a 90-day delay after a section 1983 suit is brought if it appears that the grievance procedure is a certifiable one or certified grievance procedure and that procedure has not been employed by the party filing the 1983 suit.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Yes, I would say to the gentleman.

Mr. KINDNESS. I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin for his concurrence in that clarifying statement, and I would submit this.

I would suggest that there is very little reason for section 5 to be in the bill at all. I would suggest to the Members that it does offer the danger that the Department of Justice will attempt to impress upon and require State and local governments to employ grievance procedures as outlined in the bill, with the threat that at least they would have a very hard time getting LEAA funds or other funds that might be influenced in their distribution by the Justice Department, whether there is any statutory basis for such a thing or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

(On request of Mr. BUTLER, and by unanimous consent, Mr. KINDNESS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDNESS. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I think it is very important to note the gentleman's interest in this section of the bill, but I think the gentleman's alarm about the possibility of its effect on LEAA funds, and others, is absolutely unfounded. There is no basis at all for that.

In our discussions—and, as a matter of fact, the gentleman well knows this particular part of the bill comes from our side of the subcommittee—it was our view that there is a substantial abuse of the Federal court system by the use of 1983 petitions. Many of those petitions are without real substance. These petitions which could otherwise be quickly resolved. These petitions are now going into our Federal court system, but if we had the grievance machinery, and if they were required to go through that grievance machinery, we believe that many of these cases, a great majority of them, would not lead into the Federal court system but that they would be quickly resolved, and resolved at the level where they should be resolved and that is where the grievance arises, and that is in the penal institution nor the local jail rather than having the Federal courts decide it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS) may have such additional time as I have consumed of his time, let us make it an additional 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that I would hope this would not be required, but would the gentleman concur that there is absolutely no basis in this legislation for the withholding or of having any effect on the distribution, or the granting or lending of funds for the State and local governments over which the Justice Department could have any possible effect?

Mr. BUTLER. I would be happy to affirm that statement. I would go even further and say that there was no discussion of it. The effect and intention is only that we should improve the grievance machinery and cut down on the participation of the courts in 1983 petitions, and that it is clearly not the intention of the subcommittee that this should have any effect on any other aspect of Federal funds or the LEAA activities.

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER) for his comments. I would simply urge support of the amendment in that it serves a small but limited purpose but foreseeS problems far beyond what we see now in terms of the operation of the grievance procedure that provides for participation of inmates in jails and prisons in that system of grievance procedure.

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, it would appear to me, knowing the philosophical position of the gentleman now in the well, that the gentleman would want to offer support for this section in this bill because it requires the exhaustion of remedies for 1983 petitions. Indeed, some 95½ percent of the 1983 petitions which go to the Federal courts are frivolous and this can cut down on the number of such frivolous petitions which now are sent to the Federal courts. It will save our judicial system time and money and effort. Secondly, it will push them down into the level where they belong, at the State level, for the resolution of these issues.

As I say, knowing the philosophy of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS), I do not understand why the gentleman would want to strike this particular section which would help the judicial system resolve a lot of these issues which come up to the Federal courts.

Further, I think the amendment is not well founded on the basis of the gentleman's philosophy.

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it is settled law that an exhaustion of administrative remedies is not required as a precondition of maintaining a 1983 action. For many years, some of us have felt that the requirement of exhaustion of remedies would be a desirable in the case of 1983 actions, but for various reasons it has been impossible to implement this requirement. The bill, however, makes a modest approach at an exhaustion of remedies requirement.

It allows the Attorney General to promulgate minimum standards. The States are invited to, but not required to, accept those minimum standards, and if they do, the Attorney General has a mechanism provided in the bill to certify that the States have adopted and are in substantial compliance with the minimum standards. In the event that such standards are in place, the bill further provides that in a section 1983 action a temporary 90-day suspension of that action is permissible but not required in order to give an opportunity for the administrative process to work. I think that is conceptually a good idea, but I want to question some aspects of it and invite the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

It is my understanding that the power to continue a case for 90 days is in the sound discretion of the judge. If there is in his view a plain, adequate, and speedy administrative remedy available, would that discretion to continue the case be properly exercised where there was such an administrative mechanism but which had not been certified by the Attorney General? In other words, may the States have their own administrative mechanism and choose not to submit it to the Attorney General, and the court finds it to be plain, speedy, and adequate and, therefore, be authorized to continue a case for 90 days?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGINS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I was about ready to rise to suggest this point even if not asked by the gentleman. The court may make the finding, and I read:

> . . . or the court has determined that such administrative remedy is in substantial compliance with the minimum acceptable standards promulgated pursuant to this section.

That means that the court may continue the case whether or not the procedure has been certified by the Attorney General.

Mr. WIGGINS. Even if the Attorney General has withdrawn certification? It is up to the sound discretion of the judge?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. It is. I call the attention of the House to the report at page 30 for further discussion of this issue.

Mr. WIGGINS. In light of that, Mr. Chairman, I fully support the provision, especially as I hope to amend it in a moment and, therefore, oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS).

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS).

The amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WIGGINS

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer Amendment No. 4.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. WIGGINS: On page 13, at line 8, strike the words "the participation of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "an advisory role for".

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment deals with minimum standards, section 5 of the bill. It is intended to directly confront the problem which was addressed by my friend, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS), and that is: What should be the role of the inmates themselves, not in the formulation of a suitable plan, but in its implementation? I strongly object to the requirement as a minimum standard that inmates be involved in implementing a plan. To do so will certainly create a hierarchy in prisons, some prisoners will occupy a quasi-judicial role, and it will, in my opinion, exacerbate problems of discipline and good order in prisons rather than solve them.

We must bear in mind that prisoners are not, generally speaking, of the character that we would want to occupy the role as a judge. They may, indeed, be subjected to corrupt influences. They may, indeed, exercise their discretion corruptly, and we would not be surprised to find that to be so, because they are there, in some cases, because of their corrupt propensities. My amendment does not require as a minimum standard that the inmates participate in implementing the grievance procedure. It does require, however, that inmates have an advisory role.

Now, I think that is fair. I do think there will be a certain credibility in the grievance mechanism if there is an inmate role. I think the inmates ought to participate in developing what the program is; but when it comes to implementation, that is, the judging of specific cases, I do not believe that role should require as a minimum condition that inmates act in more than an advisory capacity. That is the effect of my amendment.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGINS. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, of course, we would have objected to striking out entirely the participation of inmates and staff; but with the gentleman's suggestion is that an advisory role is appropriate for them. I would have to agree with the gentleman and I think our report agrees with the thrust of the amendment. I would like to read it again, because I think this is clearly what we had in mind:

> The first standard shall provide for the participation of employees and inmates in the formulation, implementation, and operation of the system. It is the view of the committee that a key to a successful, credible grievance resolution system is the participation of inmates, line staff and administration staff in the development of the system and the actual resolution of disputes. The committee recognizes that the ultimate and only authority for the management of the institution rests with the administration and it is the committee's intent that the inmate involvement in the system pursuant to this standard be one of substance, but primarily advisory nature.

Accordingly, I do not find objection to the gentleman's amendment. I have discussed it also with the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RAILSBACK) who can speak for himself. Accordingly, I will support the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's support. It is important to underscore that we are talking about minimum standards. It may be that a State may wish to give inmates a participatory role in implementing their grievance mechanism. I am willing that the States experiment, but I am unwilling to require that they do so as a minimum standard and my amendment would strike that requirement.

Mr. RAILSBACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGINS. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RAILSBACK. Mr. Chairman, as I have listened to the statement of the gentleman from California, it seems to me that this is a very constructive amendment; also, I think the gentleman's statement has been very helpful.

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, I urge an affirmative vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. WIGGINS).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WIGGINS

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. WIGGINS: On page 13, lines 24 and 25, strike out "not under the direct supervision or direct control of the institution." and insert "not having direct supervision or control of the person alleging the grievance."

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, this is a policy issue. There will not be agreement on both sides with respect to this issue; so I ask each of you to make a judgment as to what is right in the interest of the administration of justice and the control of prisons.

The question relates to proper grievance procedures. The present bill says that the Attorney General shall promulgate minimum standards, and one of those minimum standards is as follows: For the independent review of the disposition of grievances by a person or other entity not under the direct supervision or direct control of the institution; namely, that there will be an independent appellate review, as it were, of decisions made by an in-house grievance body.

I object to that. I believe that it is not fair to have the jailer act as the judge and jury with respect to a grievance, but I think that it is excessive to require for the resolution of these disputes that we go outside the prison and create an independent review body.

Mr. Chairman, the disputes which may arise within a prison are almost too numerous to imagine. They may involve complaints with respect to hot water, with respect to towels, with respect to mail, with respect to alleged discrimination, with respect to all manner of things. Many of them will be quite trivial.

I think that an inmate ought to have an opportunity to air his grievance. He should be able to air his grievance and have it decided by someone who does not have direct supervision or control over him, but to require as a minimum standard that every institution go outside that institution to some independent review authority to resolve these sometimes petty, sometimes serious disputes, is excessive.

My amendment does not preclude a State from establishing what amounts to a two- or three-tier level of appellate review if it wishes. The State may well establish a mechanism for the independent review of serious policy disputes raised by inmates, but here we are talking about minimum standards and this bill requires as a bare minimum that they have an independent review mechanism. That is far too much bureaucracy for the resolution of typical disputes.

My proposal simply says that the minimum standard shall be that the review of these disputes will be made by a person or entity not having direct supervision or control of the person alleging the grievance. Now, that is fair as a minimum standard.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues not to force upon State penal institutions an elaborate two- or three-tier mechanism of an appellate review of grievances as a minimum standard, and I urge the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGINS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with care to the gentleman's comments.

Do we not already have a provision for independent review without this language that is suggested here? They can apply to the courts themselves and obtain a remedy. They do have that remedy now, and that is the 1983 petition.

So are we not adding one more layer of bureaucracy here by providing for this review board outside the prison itself?

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is entirely correct. If the prisoner finds himself aggrieved and frustrated by the decision of the administrators, he may also file his action under section 1983 and obtain a judicial review.

The purpose of the grievance mechanism is to avoid litigation; that is, to resolve the matter in-house administratively. I support that concept and that is why I opposed the Kindness amendment.

But let us not make this mechanism so elaborate that it becomes literally an Administrative Procedures Act with respect to the resolution of disputes within the prison, especially since, as the gentleman knows, there always sit U.S. judges prepared to overrule the arbitrary acts of prison officials.

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman has offered a good amendment, and I support it.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's amendment would defeat the very purpose that he has spoken to; namely, to assist in diverting 1983 cases from the Federal courts.

We have to have a credible system. We modeled this particular section on the gentlemen's own State system, the California Youth Authority, which does have a three-tiered grievance mechanism procedure, two of them in-house and one of them external.

In the California system, the first tier is a mixed inmate and staff board. Then, if the grievance is turned down there, you may go later to the superintendent of the institution. If it is turned down there, then you may seek an external review outside the institution.

The purpose is, in fact, to get these matters resolved at the administrative level, and not to bring 1983 petitions to the Federal court to make a Federal case out of them, if it is unnecessary.

And yet all the gentleman's amendment does is to strike out a good portion, perhaps the most effective portion, of the three-tiered suggestion that is contained in the bill.

For example, if the source of the grievance is the superintendent himself, what does it profit us to provide that he need go to an inmate staff board and then appeal to the superintendent himself? A credible grievance mechanism requires the ability to go to an independent review authority before seeking court review, before having exhausted these administrative procedures.

I might suggest that not only California but even the Federal system employs such a procedure.

Mr. Chairman, I have a letter from Norman A. Carlson, Director, Bureau of Prisons, and I will quote this portion:

> The policy of the Federal Bureau of Prisons relating to the administrative remedy of grievance procedure calls for an independent review of a warden's decision by the Regional Director and, if desired, by the General Counsel of the Bureau of Prisons.

The Federal system works appropriately and successfully in diverting some of these cases from the Federal courts and reaching a fair and speedy resolution of complaints.

If the gentleman's amendment is agreed to, then indeed we would have, in good measure, failed what we hoped to achieve in providing an adequate mechanism at the State level so that they do not end up making a Federal case of it pursuant to the 1983 petition in the Federal courts.

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ERTEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman have any information as to the State of California? When they reached the independent review level, how many cases have been diverted from going further as a result of the independent review at that level, have not gone beyond that?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. I regret to say to my friend that I do not have data accessible on that, but I think common sense would indicate that the third level would cause the minimization of the number of cases that would end up in court.

Mr. ERTEL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DRINAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DRINAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman confirm the fact that the subcommittee has chosen something that all administrative officials in correction agree to, namely that there has to be somebody outside the system in order to give credibility. However, this is a very limited independent review that is granted in this bill. It is not required that the review be outside the corrections department, just outside the institution in which the inmate is incarcerated.

Would the gentleman concur that we have given a very limited independent review and a review that is really indispensable to the credibility of the entire process?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Yes, I concur in the gentleman's observation.

Mr. RAILSBACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I, along with many others of the Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties, and the Administration of Justice, have exercised oversight over prisons and correctional facilities. I have had occasion to visit many jails, many prisons, and have had an opportunity to interview many inmates as well as correctional officers and administrative personnel.

In interviewing the inmates, without a doubt, at many institutions there is a great deal of cynicism, of frustration, if not outright despair. Part of that is caused, in my opinion, because the inmates feel, even those who are honor inmates—and I am really speaking for them in respect to this matter—that they have had no real ability to communicate or to have their grievances even heard.

My feeling, as has been indicated by the chairman of the subcommittee and also by the director of the Bureau of Prisons, is that if we are to somehow alleviate the cynicism and the frustration, then I think that we are well advised to truly provide for an independent review. In the eyes of the inmates that independent review would not be by the warden of a particular institution who must deal all of the time with the people who are carrying out his orders.

Mr. Chairman, despite my very high regard for the gentleman from California (Mr. WIGGINS), I think this amendment is bad. My feeling is that if we are going to have independent review, let that independent review be by someone who has no supervision over an inmate in a particular institution. In other words, let us do what they are now doing on the Federal level, which is to require somebody like a regional authority to conduct an independent review.

Mr. Chairman, I urge that we vote down the amendment.

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAILSBACK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's opposition to my amendment.

I wish to ask some questions which do not relate to the issue of independent review. I think however we ought to have at least some discussion with respect to the nature of that review.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to know just how much due process we are going to require with respect to such review. If we are silent, I assure the gentleman that there will be controversy and perhaps litigation over that issue.

Is it not clear that the prisoner is entitled at least to make his argument, but that it is not required that he be represented by counsel?

Mr. RAILSBACK. That is true.

Mr. WIGGINS. It is not required that there be necessarily a further appellate review of the decision of the reviewing authority; is that not correct?

Mr. RAILSBACK. May I just very briefly try to sketch for the gentleman what I think the likely sequence of events would be.

Mr. WIGGINS. All right.

Mr. RAILSBACK. I had a chance to visit the so-called Nilles School, which is a correctional facility in the State of California. They have a grievance procedure which has worked very well.

It works in this way: They try to, first of all, informally resolve any grievance. They do that with staff people and two inmates who sort of sit in judgment and sort of act as conciliators or even arbitrators.

Many, many times it is not necessary to go beyond that. They are able to either informally resolve the dispute or the grievance. In the event that it may be necessary to go beyond that, then they can go to the warden of the facility.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RAILSBACK) has expired.

(On request of Mr. WIGGINS and by unanimous consent, Mr. RAILSBACK was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. RAILSBACK. To continue, Mr. Chairman, then they have the opportunity to go before the warden, who, of course, has supervisory powers over the entire institution.

What we are providing here is that at least at some stage, there must be an independent review if an independent review is needed. In other words, we are not trying to suggest that we do not give the supervisory personnel in the institution an opportunity to participate in a review-type capacity; but we are saying at some point there ought to be, in a particular case, an independent review.

Mr. WIGGINS. If the gentleman will yield further, in my opinion, the original grievance mechanism and any review thereof entitles the prisoner only to the barest form of due process. By that I mean that he is entitled to notice of the fact that his complaints will be heard, and he is entitled to be heard himself.

Beyond that, all of the sophisticated aspects of procedural due process are not necessarily required in this context.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAILSBACK. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, I would confirm the gentleman's observation in that connection. There is no due process accorded here for the inmate. The inmate is not entitled, certainly under this, to be represented by counsel, not entitled to a hearing. The review may be exclusively a paper review.

The only thing—and the only thing, I state—is that the review be independent, and that it be by a person or entity not under the direct supervision or control of the institution. Beyond that, there is no due process accorded by virtue of this subsection.

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAILSBACK. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Chairman, I have heard this argument, and I agree with much of what the gentleman says, but that sounds all right for a very sophisticated prison system such as California and the Pennsylvania Bureau of Prisons and the federal system. But, let us get down to the local jails which are included within this, local jails which may have an average inmate population of 4 per year, or 3, or 10, and there are a lot of jails throughout the country that have that.

The gentleman is setting up now as a minimum standard a very overwhelming bureaucracy. What do these people do to get these independent reviews, and how much bureaucracy are we going to require for those very small prisons? That is why I support Mr. WIGGINS. Those sophisticated systems such as the gentleman is talking about should have an independent review, but those very unsophisticated systems should not.

I appreciate the gentleman's comments.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Wiggins amendment. As a member of the subcommittee, I would not like to leave the impression that the opposition to the Wiggins amendment was unanimous. This is, in my judgment, a softening of the implications without destroying the substance of the grievance procedure.

I think in the long run it will make it much easier for the States to develop an acceptable grievance procedure without really damaging the rights of inmates. Under those circumstances, I think it is an appropriate amendment offered by the gentleman from California, and rise in support of it.

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is not the only one in opposition to the subcommittee. I am also, and I support the Wiggins amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the gentleman, and I say that my regard for the gentleman from Pennsylvania has increased immeasurably today in his last two appearances on this floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. WIGGINS).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WIGGINS) there were—ayes 7; noes 12.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time only to clarify a definition in the bill. I am sure the definition is readily clear to the committee and the Members who have dealt with the subject, but I do want to raise a few questions with the chairman, if he would care to respond.

Under the definition, the term "institution" refers to any facility, institution, and it has in subsections (A) and (B) a set of nomenclature describing the institutions. It would seem to me that one could perhaps find himself interpreting that definition to include also, in some cases, educational institutions across the country, because in fact it is current policy to move people who are covered under subsection (b)—retarded or handicapped, and so forth—and provide protection in "educational institutions."

One might be able to interpret that this bill will in fact apply to public and private schools which are basically designed not as institutions to provide living facilities but educational facilities, as well as some civic organizations which have day care facilities, halfway houses, et cetera, that do not provide full residence type of service but do in fact provide in an institutional way services to people who are mentioned in that section. These are questions of concern to me and I would like to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin to get some clarification.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman,

the gentleman raises a good question. The committee intended that these terms be narrowly construed. At least, for example, we refer to an institution—and I add parenthetically, primarily as a residential facility for persons who are mentally ill, disabled, and retarded. We are not speaking about institutions in which incidentally certain people who are mentally ill, disabled, or retarded or handicapped attend. It must be an institution operated by or on behalf of the State, or under a contract with the State or a political subdivision. It must be a "State" institution or one which is otherwise qualified. It is an institution for the purpose obviously of aiding persons who are vulnerable and are handicapped in some way within a residential facility.

It would not in all probability cover the instance the gentleman alluded to of a nonpublic institution, and we are speaking about institutions operated by the State, and it would not include any State-operated school which is for a purpose other than for treating persons mentally ill, disabled, chronically ill, or handicapped or juveniles residing there or receiving care for any other State purpose.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Would it include institutions such as hospital facilities which obviously have on a temporary residence basis people who can fall into the description of subsection 1(b)? Would it include day care centers where essentially the person is residenced in his own home but a day care center would primarily be providing services to people who are chronically ill or mentally ill or retarded, and so forth?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. In my opinion it would not. As I see it, either individuals operating a day care center or children who are temporarily there would not be covered. In any event, all of the categories refer to residence. They must reside within this institution. It is intended, for example, to cover, say, classically, an orphanage operated by the State, but I do not believe that a day care center as presently understood would be covered under this language.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Would it cover an institution similar to a drug or alcohol treatment center in which an individual either on a voluntary basis or by the courts is assigned for a residence period in which the individual is expected to graduate, so to speak, at a certain period?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GARY A. MYERS was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman may be describing, indeed, a facility that would be covered if the people under treatment in that facility are, in fact, residents, and if that facility is operated by or on behalf of the State or under a contract with the State, and they are there for that type of illness or handicap. They may be there under court order, in some instances.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) would care to respond further, what about a community which has an alcohol treatment center in which a person is a resident for perhaps a period of several weeks, certainly less than a year, so to speak, he is a full-time resident during that period of time and, nature, he is, essentially, an active participant in the general community, but because of a particular problem which might be described as a chronic illness has entered a facility such as that, is it the committee's intent to require that hospital to come under compliance of these type of procedures, and so forth, for that sector of their facility?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. If the gentleman will yield further, of course, there is no particular compliance that is sought. If this is a "State" institution, and if they have residents for any of these categories and if they have the pattern or the practice of denying the constitutional or Federal statutory rights of those individuals, by virtue of that they would be certainly included.

I suggest that it is not necessarily the voluntary or involuntary character of the residency that describes the coverage. You can have 100 very old people who voluntarily go to some institution but, in all practicality, they may have lost their freedom.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, my concern is that I think the definition is somewhat loose. It would seem to me that some Members who may support the bill may be surprised in a year or 2 down the road when they find some institutions which they thought were not institutions covered under this bill are subjected to the provisions of this bill.

I am wondering if in the conference with the Senate or in the conference report whether concern could be raised and brought back to the House fairly describing the types of institutions that would be covered?

One final concern I might have is for a person who is mentally ill, handicapped, chronically ill, or falls into one of these other definitions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GARY A. MYERS was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, if I may continue, and if that individual were, in fact, over the age of 18, was an independent, in that sense of the word, but was "institutionalized" in his own family home or in another individual's home who has agreed to provide a residence in a sense for the individual, is there anything in this bill which subjects the person whose home or facility is providing that residence to be subjected to the provisions of this bill?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. From what I understand of the gentleman's hypothetical situation, I would think they would not be covered if the gentleman is talking about a home. A group home might be covered if "State action" exists. We are talking about residences in primarily public institutions, under public authority or facilities acting on behalf of the State or under contract with it.

I might add further that the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GARY A. MYERS) may not be entirely happy with the definition, but I can assure the gentleman that the committee has worked on this for a long time. The Senate is working on it at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GARY A. MYERS was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. KASTENMEIER. I do not believe that any definition could please everybody.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WIGGINS

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WIGGINS: On page 9, line 10, strike out "or laws".

On page 10, line 6, strike out "or laws".

On page 11, line 8 and line 15, strike out "or laws".

On page 12, line 5 and lines 19–20, strike out "or laws".

Mr. WIGGINS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment deletes the words "or laws" wherever those words appear in the bill. This is not a technical amendment. It is an important substantive amendment. At the conclusion of the debate, I will announce now, it is my intention to obtain a record vote on the amendment if sufficient Members stand up and support that request.

Mr. Chairman, as the Members know, standing is granted to the Attorney General to vindicate the rights of inmates which are secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States. The scope and the reach of constitutional rights is generally known. However, the power of the Attorney General to protect rights conferred by treaties, by Federal statutes, by Federal rules and regulations, and by Federal executive orders—all of which under certain circumstances rise to the level of laws of the United States—is unclear. The hearings demonstrate that the Attorney General intends to move against institutions involved in the delivery of health services by challenging the quality of care and the treatment of patients on the theory that the laws of the United States are being violated. The committee has apparently ratified this plan of action. The report cites with approval the theory of the Solomon case where the Government argued that the Developmental Disabilities Act of 1975 gave a statutory right to individual inmates to a certain quality of health care and freedom from harm. Likewise, the theory of the Mattson case is also cited wherein it was alleged in that case that treatment, training, education, decent living conditions, and pay for certain work was a right accorded inmates in State institutions by Federal statute. Other similar cases are also cited with approval in the report.

In addition, on page 21 of the report various statutes which are apparently targeted as a basis for the exercise of Federal jurisdiction under this bill are listed.

In summary, then, it is unmistakably clear that the Attorney General intends to utilize various statutes, some of which are financial aid programs enacted by Congress, as the basis for claiming that individual inmates or patients are given enforceable rights under those statutes. This proposition is, I believe, legally questionable and ought not to be condoned by this committee. The Developmental Disabilities Act demonstrates the essential point. That act was the basis for the Federal assertion of jurisdiction in the Solomon case. That act provides funds to States in support of certain health facilities. As an introduction to the statute, Congress made certain sweeping findings, including the finding that all Americans are entitled to quality health care. The body of the statute, however, was a typical grant-in-aid program. Surely such a financial aid statute does not give an individual the right to sue on the basis of the sweeping declaration of policy contained in its preamble. But the Attorney General maintains to the contrary, and this committee apparently intends, unless my amendment is adopted, to support the Attorney General in his interpretation.

The desire of the Attorney General should be recognized for precisely what it is—a grab for power to supervise, with the aid of the Federal courts, the day-to-day operation of State health facilities. Striking "or laws" will confine the Attorney General to constitutional violations and will prevent him from using "or laws" as a hook on which to hang Federal jurisdiction over the operation of State health care institutions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. WIGGINS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. WIGGINS. The problem which I envision, and which the record fully supports, can be obviated or at least minimized, I believe, if the record before this committee is unmistakably clear that the Attorney General may maintain an action under this bill only if the law of the United States alleged to have been violated confers or authorizes a private right of action upon the inmate personally.

If it does, I have less zeal for my amendment. If it does not, however, then my amendment surely must be adopted.

Mr. Chairman, I urge support for my amendment.

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time in order to ask the author of this amendment some questions. I am certain that what we want to do by this legislation is to protect the rights of institutionalized persons, particularly where they allege that they are being deprived of their basic constitutional rights; but as I understand the purpose of the gentleman's amendment, it is to avoid our having inmates get involved in all kinds of potential litigation relating to a variety of laws that we may pass with regard to the construction or the health or safety conditions in institutions. For example, construction of facilities to assist the handicapped or for clinical services and any other detailed provisions of law might apply to all such institutions, but would not directly involve an individual inmate in such an institution. Is my understanding of the purpose of the gentleman's amendment correct that you wish this measure to provide a mechanism for protecting primarily the constitutional rights of institutionalized persons?

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLORY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, in general, the purpose of my amendment is consistent with the gentleman's understanding.

I offer my amendment because the Attorney General and the Secretary of HEW have a contrary understanding. It is evident from their testimony and from the committee report that they fully intend to take laws that confer no right of action in favor of an inmate, but, nevertheless, are the laws of the United States, as the basis for asserting the right to intervene or to file an original action to control the conduct of these institutions.

I think that is wrong. It trenches very heavily on the principle of federalism and we ought to rein them in on this grab for power.

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Chairman, there are a great many pressures being applied by the Federal Government to impose basic health and safety standards in the State institutions. These pressures are being applied through various departments of the Federal Government; nevertheless, it is my understanding that those rights of action, those pressures, those administrative and judicial proceedings, will continue under the authority of the appropriate Federal officers and would not be delegated to an individual inmate in the institution and that the effect of the gentleman's amendment would be to carry out that purpose, as I have explained it.

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, that is my hope. It is apparent to me from the record that Mr. Drew Day and the Secretary of HEW do not have that narrow reading of their authority in mind. They intend to seize upon regulatory statutes and grant-in-aid programs in support of their claim that a law of the United States has been violated and, therefore, their power to intervene in the day-to-day operation of State institutions, and that is wrong.

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Chairman, I think unless some clarifying language is substituted for that proposed by the committee, which would have the effect of the adoption of the amendment, the gentleman's amendment should be adopted.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLORY. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The alarm expressed by the gentleman from California (Mr. WIGGINS) as to the zeal which we can anticipate from the Department of Justice in this area is well-founded.

This particular question as to whether the words, "or laws," should be stricken or not was before our subcommittee and has been discussed at great length. We invited comment from the Department of Justice.

We have a letter from Mr. Drew Days saying that while all cases that can be visualized as being brought under this bill, if enacted, would involve some kind of 14th amendment claim, there are rights which institutionalized persons have that might be based on a Federal statute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. McCLORY) has expired.

(On request of Mr. BUTLER, and by unanimous consent, Mr. McCLORY was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLORY. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, clearly it is the basis of this legislation to anticipate parlaying the words, "or laws," into several causes of action, not only based on statutes but on regulations, which are laws, on court decisions, which are laws, and indeed on administrative interpretations, which are laws.

This is just too far to go. This is just too much authority to give the Attorney General of the United States when we are setting up a new right of action in the Attorney General. For that reason I think the limitations of this amendment are very well founded, and I support the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. WIGGINS).

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we would be moving a long step forward if we approved this legislation based upon alleged deprivation of Federal constitutional rights. To go beyond that without much more clarification or much more direction as to where we are going would seem to me to be most unwise.

Mr. Chairman, I hope, therefore, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. WIGGINS) will be adopted.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. KASTENMEIER AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WIGGINS

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KASTENMEIER as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. WIGGINS: On page 9, line 8, after the word "which" insert the following: "cause them to suffer grevious harm and".

On page 11, line 13, after the word "which" insert the following: "cause grievous harm and".

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is designed to reassure the Members as to the use of the term, "Constitution or laws of the United States," as contained in the bill.

As suggested by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER), this has indeed been debated time and time again before the subcommittee, before the full committee, and even now before the Committee of the Whole.

It would be unprecedented and I know of no other legislation in history which relies exclusively on the Constitution. The term, "Constitution or laws of the United States," goes back to 1871 statutes. It has a well-understood meaning, and if Assistant Attorney General Drew Days was somewhat exuberant in the interpretation he reached prospectively of the Department's position in terms of its reliance upon the language, I would like to set the record straight.

The term that I have offered as an amendment, embodying the words, "grievous harm," is a standard by which laws of the United States, in conjunction with the Constitution, have been interpreted by the courts. I will cite just Kimbrough versus O'Neil.

I will also say to the committee that the same apprehensions and reservavations expressed by the gentleman from California (Mr. WIGGINS) were expressed by one or more Senators in their consideration of the bill, and in fact the amendment I offer today is a resolution reached by that body, at least in its full committee, with respect to the meaning of "laws."

It would be, I think, a grave mistake to try to limit this so that every case must reach a constiutional level. Even though, as a matter of practice, and as is suggested, the 14th amendment and other constitutional protections are relied upon for vindication, the Congress does speak in a contemporary way through its laws.

The Congress does speak through its laws and does, I think, contemplate the vindication of rights through the expression of statutory laws from time to time, and even though that is not often, it does take place.

Mr. Chairman, I would also suggest to the committee that the limitations of this bill are substantial. Beyond this, the constitutional laws of the United States, there must be a pattern or practice of denial of rights. The matter under consideration has to involve an abuse so that the correction of the abuse is a matter of general public importance. And, as I have suggested before, this does not contemplate that the Justice Department undertake any great incremental new burden of litigation. It contemplates targeting certain cases within this country wherein the abuse is so egregious in these terms that it is necessary, other means having failed, to pursue it.

By striking the words or laws of the United States we will have, it seems to me, turned the clock back. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the further standard of grievous harm will serve as sufficient limitation for any who feel that the laws of the United States give too great a breadth, in terms of vindicating these rights.

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment qualifies the kind of conduct, whether it be a constitutional violation or a law violation, by adding the words "causing grievous harm."

The gentleman claims the words modify both the constitutional violation, as well as the statutory violation.

If he is correct that it modifies the constitutional violation, I think such a result would be inconsistent with the present cases and practice, and unwise.

The rights of prisoners, for example, have not involved eighth amendment deprivations only. There have been first amendment rights recognized with respect to mail, which do not involve grievous harm to the inmate. There have been first amendment rights with respect to the access to legal materials, generally deprivations falling short of cruel and unusual punishment.

If it is the purpose of this amendment to qualify those rights by saying they can only be the basis of a lawsuit if there is a grievous harm—and I take that to be harm in the nature of grievous personal injury to an inmate, as alleged—then it seriously narrows the scope of existing rights of inmates to seek relief.

It is asserted that this amendment restates current law. Well, I do not think it does restate current law with respect to constitutional deprivations. The phrase has been used—and I acknowledge that—with respect to whether or not a statute gives a cause of action to an inmate. In those cases the courts have occasionally found that no right of action was intended and is not to be implied unless grievious harm was visited upon the plantiff.

This proposal tracks language adopted in the Senate hastily. It was, in my opinion, a vehicle to get the support of a single Senator who had reservations.

We, in my opinion, should not ratify that hasty action. There is a much more fundamental way to deal with the problem, and my amendment offers that fundamental way.

Mr. Chairman, while I have the floor, I wish to get the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) and see whether I can obtain his agreement that for a law to form the basis of Attorney General action, that law must confer a private right of action upon the inmate personally. If he does not agree with that statement—and I would believe that he would almost have to—then, without question, my amendment must be adopted.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Chairman, I would say I would agree with the gentleman but qualify it to say private or public right of action.

Mr. WIGGINS. Public right of action troubles me. I realize that, there are some cases which have held that when there is a general public wrong being committed, a right of action in the Attorney General will be implied and recognized. There are very few cases which do that in other contexts, but in this narrow area of the law, the Solomon case stands for the proposition that no such public right of action in favor of the Attorney General is recognized by implication. Statutory authorization for such an action must be found if it is to be recognized at all.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's agreeing with me halfway. That is progress.

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGINS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Chairman, I am a bit curious about this matter and perhaps the gentleman can enlighten me.

The amendment that is proposed would be, I imagine, a substitute for the gentleman's amendment, and the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin contains the language, "cause them to suffer grievous harm."

As I read this language, that is a modifier of the Constitution as well.

Mr. WIGGINS. Indeed.

Mr. ERTEL. Are we saying that certain constitutional rights are different or that they do not create or suffer grievous harm by the denial of constitutional rights, or does that imply physical harm?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. WIGGINS) has expired.

Mr. RAILSBACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise in opposition to the Wiggins amendment and in support of the substitute amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to a Justice Department opinion which was requested by the committee, which concerns me a great deal with respect to the Wiggins amendment, if it is accurate.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to quote from the opinion. It says the following:

Suits to redress violations in any Group (C) [jails, prisons, or pretrial detention facilities] or Group (D) [juvenile facilities] institutions would be relatively unaffected if the phrase "or laws" were removed from the bill, since virtually all Section 2 suits in those institutions would allege violations of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Actions involving Group (A) [facilities for the mentally ill, disabled, or retarded], Group (B) [the physically handicapped], or Group (E) [nursing homes] would be drastically affected. The typical Group (A) institution sued by the Department is a large, understaffed building where residents live in wretched conditions and receive little or no training or treatment. While some courts have found a "right to treatment" implicit in the Constitution, others have not, which means the constitutional protections for residents in mental retardations centers and mental hospitals are at best uncertain, even as to eighth amendment standards.

There are statutory protections for residents in those institutions: Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 which prohibits discrimination against the handicapped in any federally financed program; the Developmentally Disabled Assistance and Bill of Rights Act; the Special Health Revenue Sharing Act; and Title XI– of the Social Security Act, to name only the major statutes in the area. If H.R. 9400 were restricted to only "Constitutional violations", however, the Government would be precluded from utilizing these statutes, which in many jurisdictions may well bar any meaningful Government action, even in the most shocking cases.

May I just say that if that is true, then as I understand the memorandum, what they are saying is that the Wiggins amendment would not do any great harm as far as petitions filed by a prisoner, but as far as people affected that may be in mental retardation centers or mental hospitals, it could really prevent—according to this memorandum—the Justice Department from trying to correct what would have to be a pattern of abuse and conditions which really result, under the gentleman's substitute amendment, where grievous harm exist. So, I am bothered by that. It seems to me that maybe it is very important that we address that particular issue.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAILSBACK. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is answering the question which is raised, but just in order that we might understand what the Department of Justice is talking about in this memorandum—which I do not recall having seen—did they not address themselves to the substitute which the gentleman offered? Did they address the issue of grievous harm?

Mr. RAILSBACK. They did address the issue of grievous harm, but then they were asked to give their opinion of what the effect would be of the amendment removing the words "or laws." This is before the gentleman's substitute was even conceived, as far as I know. What they are saying is that you are all right if you adopt the amendment; you may be all right as far as affording protection of jail inmates or prisoners, but as far as people that may be in a mental health center or a mental hospital or a mental retardation center, they may not be able to allege successfully any violation of constitutional rights. That, I think, is what they are saying.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

(At the request of Mr. WIGGINS and by unanimous consent, Mr. RAILSBACK was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAILSBACK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, that is not the position of the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice has proceeded in mental health cases on the basis that the inmates therein have been deprived of constitutional rights, as well as certain alleged statutory rights.

Mr. RAILSBACK. If the gentleman will let me say this: I have read the Justice Department memorandum, and I think that it represents their position.

Mr. WIGGINS. Their position is more clearly reflected in their pleadings. In the pleadings in the Solomon case and the Mattson case both, they asserted—these are health care cases—14th amendment violations. It is difficult to tie an 8th amendment violation to a person who is not in jail, I think, but there are other provisions of the Constitution, primarily the 14th amendment, which provide ample ground, at least for the Attorney General to proceed on the basis of a constitutional violation.

But, here in my hand is a statement on Drew Days indicating what he intends to do on the basis of statutory rights. He intends to proceed on the basis of congressional declarations contained in the Developmental Disabilities Act. That is terribly obnoxious to me when that is only a grant in aid program, conferring no rights at all upon the inmates. It is merely stating a matter of policy for inducing the Congress to make the grant.

Mr. RAILSBACK. I understand what the gentleman is saying. If there are in fact, as suggested by the opinion, situations which may not amount to a constitutional deprivation because somebody is in a mental health hospital rather than in a prison, it bothers me that the Justice Department may not be able to act in that particular case.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RAILSBACK) has expired.

(On request of Mrs. FENWICK, and by unanimous consent, Mr. RAILSBACK was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAILSBACK. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. FENWICK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Could the gentleman or perhaps the author of the amendment explain? Do I understand, or are we trying to say, that the law defending these people shall not be followed when we strike "or laws" on the page, and so on? I mean, how could it be that anyone would want to remove the protection of any law?

Mr. RAILSBACK. I think the gentlewoman had better direct her question to the gentleman from California.

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, the problem is that not all laws of the United States give me the right to sue. The laws that the Attorney General seeks to employ are not necessarily for the rights of the inmates nor do they give the inmates any rights at all, but the Attorney General seeks to use those laws.

Mrs. FENWICK. But if the gentleman will yield further, of all the people in the world who need the protection of the laws, and there are too few laws to protect them, it seems to me these are the people in the institutions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. WIGGINS).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WIGGINS) there were—ayes 17, noes 16.

So the amendment offered as a substitute for the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. WIGGINS), as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to make brief mention of the fact that my colleague Mr. BIAGGI had intended to offer as an amendment to this bill, the text of his law enforcement officers bill of rights (H.R. 181). In consultation with him I advised him that it was not germane to this legislation. However, I do want to indicate my agreement with the concerns which motivated him to want to sponsor his amendment. The civil rights of our law enforcement personnel are often overlooked as we zealously pursue them for others. Mr. BIAGGI in his extensive research on this subject has uncovered numerous instances where law enforcement officers when subjects of investigations within their own departments, are denied basic civil rights. There is something amiss when law enforcement personnel cannot have the same guarantees of civil rights that all other Americans enjoy.

I appreciate the commitment of my colleague to this issue and hope a more appropriate legislative vehicle is made available to accommodate his interest.

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to once again commend my colleague, Mr. KASTENMEIER, for providing the House the opportunity to discuss this important and long-overdue piece of legislation. I support the objectives of this measure and would like to comment on the need for its enactment.

Although the Bill of Rights assures that basic civil rights are an inalienable condition of U.S. citizenship, and even though provisions which deal with patients' rights in institutions are included in medicaid and medicare regulations, the enforcement of these rights has been woefully inadequate. On many occasions, as chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging, I have been shocked and educated when advised not once, but many times, of the gross, inhumane treatment encountered by residents of nursing homes and other State operated institutions. Unfortunately, such tragic situations have not only been tolerated but even allowed to persist in institutions around the country. Our committee has uncovered countless instances in which the rights of patients are infringed, where persons are involuntarily committed or released from institutions without provisions for care, or where older and poorer citizens in hospitals and nursing homes live in fear that attempts to seek better care or to complain about inadequate care would inevitably lead to further hardship. At present, the only remedy is a total cutoff of Federal reimbursement. As a consequence, the Federal Government has been reluctant to withdraw its share of dollars from a home if such action would force the home to close.

In addition, as chairman of the former House Select Committee on Crime, the need for a procedure which would permit inmates the opportunity for redress when abuses arise was obvious. The Attica uprising is a compelling example of the problems we can continue to expect until appropriate grievance procedures, such as this bill could recommend, are in place.

I was pleased to join Congressman COHEN last year in the introduction of legislation designed to provide for the development and enforcement of standards relating to the rights of patients in medical facilities, while at the same time permitting patients to become active participants in the decision affecting their own health and bodies. This bill received the benefit of discussion during debate on H.R. 3, the Medicare-Medicaid Anti-Fraud and Abuse Act, and I am happy to report that we received assurances at that time that hearings on this legislation will be held at the earliest possible time.

So Congress is becoming increasingly aware of the need to devise mechanisms to insure that the constitutional rights of all persons are protected.

This bill will not by itself totally resolve the deplorable conditions and abuses which exist in many of our Nation's institutions, nor will it necessarily provide the mechanism for the redress of every institutionalized individual's complaint. But it is certainly an important and necessary first step in that direction. Ultimately, those State officials who administer programs for the institutionalized will determine the success of what we in Congress prescribe in legislation today.●

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further amendments, the question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OBERSTAR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 9400) to authorize actions for redress in cases involving deprivations of rights of institutionalized persons secured or protected by the Constitution or laws of the United States pursuant to House Resoluton 1150, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MR. KINDNESS

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. KINDNESS. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KINDNESS moves to recommit the bill, H.R. 9400 to the Committee on the Judiciary with the instructions to report back the same to the House forthwith with the following amendment: Strike all after the enacting clause.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS) desire to be heard on his motion to recommit?

Mr. KINDNESS. I do, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS) is recognized for 5 minutes in support of his motion to recommit.

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, and Members of the House, I will try not to take the full 5 minutes, but I believe, even though there are so few of us here, it is probably desirable to take a little bit of time and summarize the legislation that is before us, because it has been so long since H.R. 9400 was first on the floor, and I do wish that there were the opportunity for more people to refresh their recollections about just what this bill does.

I might say for the benefit of those Members of the House who are back in their offices watching this on their TV sets that this might be an appropriate time for them to turn up the volume on their hearing aids.

Mr. Speaker, we have before us a bill which really has weakly demonstrated its way along through three sessions on the House floor. It has been pulled, or at least proceedings have been stopped in the debate due to the lateness of the hour on two previous occasions, and so I believe we should consider some of the facts concerning it as it has proceeded through the House on this, the third day.

The whole thrust of H.R. 9400 is for the Congress to empower the Justice Department to tell the States, through lawsuits, how to run their institutions for the mentally ill, the mentally retarded and, to a certain degree, under certain circumstances, prisons and jails.

There is nothing in this bill to help the States do the job of protecting the rights and preserving the interests of people who are inmates or patients in those institutions. In every case where the Attorney General has intervened to attempt to protect the constitutional rights of patients and inmates in such State institutions, there has always been an answer to their problem, and there is always an answer to these problems in terms of more adequate staffing, more adequate facilities, better provisions in terms of food and administration, and it all costs money, and there is nothing in this bill to address that problem.

There is only one thrust of this bill, and that is to empower the Attorney General to go after the States to make them adversaries in litigation. States and local governments will thus find themselves at odds with the United States of America in litigation. The answer to the problems that underlie this litigation require money. There is nothing in the thinking of the people who are pushing H.R. 9400 to provide funds to help States and local governments overcome those problems. I would suggest to the Members that H.R. 9400 ought to be the second step in the process. In the first place, we ought to be, if we are really concerned with the constitutional rights and the problems of inmates and patients in State institutions, looking to how we can help to alleviate those problems. Then as the second step when the ability is there, perhaps at that point we can provide such powers to the Attorney General. But right now we ought to be taking the money that will eventually be required to hire lawyers in the Department of Justice and to litigate, and use it to help the patients and the inmates in these institutions. It is for that reason that I urge the Members to vote no on H.R. 9400. I realize it has the wonderful kind of title that makes it almost impossible to vote against it, but, indeed, it is only a second step, and we have not taken the first step, and we ought to be taking that first step before we thus empower the Department of Justice, before we go telling the States and local governments how to run their business.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I will only take 1 minute. We have debated this measure for three sessions. I think the moment of truth has finally come, and I hope, as the gentleman from Ohio suggests, that it is virtually impossible to vote against this bill. Actually it will be the first step forward in a field affecting the handicapped, affecting the mentally ill, the mentally retarded, juveniles, the aged citizens who are in institutions, as well as prisoners. We have attempted for the first time to bring some order in terms of our judicial system, some responsibility, both congressional and executive, as well as judicial, in answering questions of abuse of constitutional rights of individuals in institutions.

Mr. Speaker, I hope and pray the House will reject the motion to recommit and approve the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 254, nays 69, not voting 109, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed, H.R. 9400.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. YATES). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, On rollcall No. 614, final passage of H.R. 9400, civil rights of institutionalized persons, I was unavoidably detained in my office on official business. Had I been present and voting, I would have voted "aye."

DISPOSITION OF CERTAIN RECREATIONAL DEMONSTRATION PROJECT LANDS BY STATE OF OKLAHOMA

Mr. RISENHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's desk the Senate bill (S. 920) relating to the disposition of certain recreational demonstration project lands by the State of Oklahoma, with a Senate amendment to the House amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment to the House amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment to the House amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 19, of the House engrossed amendment, strike out "2(a)" and insert "102(2)(C)".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman from Oklahoma explain the Senate amendment to us.

Mr. RISENHOOVER. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Speaker, in H.R. 4691, as reported by the Interior Committee, there is a provision that any new deed issued by the Secretary of the Interior to permit oil and gas development on the Lake Murray demonstration lands shall require that development take place only pursuant to a plan which has been reviewed by the Secretary and that the review must include the preparation of any environmental impact statement pursuant to section 2(a) of the National Environmental Policy Act.

When H.R. 4691 passed the House, the language of that bill was substituted in the Senate bill—S. 920—as an amendment to the Senate bill. The citation to the Environmental Policy Act was wrong—it should have been section 102 2(c) instead of section 2(a). The Senate amended the bill to make the correction in the citation. There was no other change made in the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his explanation, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE 1977 ANNUAL REPORT OF ACTION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and the Committee on International Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith the 1977 Annual Report of ACTION as required by section 407 of the Domestic Volunteer Services Act of 1973, as amended.

JIMMY CARTER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 28, 1978.

ANNUAL REPORTS ON MILITARY AWARDS PROGRAMS OF DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE AND DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith the Annual Reports on Military Awards Programs of the Department of Defense and the Department of Transportation. These Reports, in part, describe activities prior to the beginning of my Administration.

JIMMY CARTER.

CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION ACT OF 1978

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 12432) to extend the Commission on Civil Rights for 5 years, to authorize appropriations for the Commission, to effect certain technical changes to comply with changes in the law, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. EDWARDS).

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the grounds that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 303, nays 5, not voting 124, as follows:

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 12432, with Mr. DE LA GARZA in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole House rose on Monday, June 26, 1978, all time for general debate had expired, and the bill had been considered as having been read and open to amendment at any point.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENT

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 21, strike out "insert" and insert in lieu thereof "inserting."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any amendments?

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. BUTLER

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. BUTLER: Page 2, strike out line 11 and all that follows through line 5 on page 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 3. (a) Section 104 of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (42 U.S.C. 1975c) is amended—

(1) by redesignating paragraph (6) of subsection (b); and

(2) by redesignating subsection (b) and (c) as (c) and (d), respectively.

Page 4, line 10, strike out "$12,752,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,752,000".

Page 4, beginning in line 11, strike out ", and not to exceed" and all that follows through "Act" in line 13.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered en bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, those amendments accomplish two related objectives. They would strike the provisions in this legislation which seek to add authority for the Commission to study discrimination in the denial of equal protection of the laws of the aged and the handicapped. At the same time the amendments return the Commission's authorization on appropriations to the level requested by the administration and the Office of Management and Budget, $10,752,000. The Commission was originally established to study denials of equal protection of the laws based on race, color, religion, and national origin. Sex discrimination was added in 1972 when Congress last extended the life of the Commission for 5 years. The Commission does not need to be involved in every timely issue which appears to be fashionable and generates publicity. For all too long the Commission has been tempted to hop on popular bandwagons which attract attention to itself. No one can deny that the aged and the handicapped need governmental forums in order to discuss their problems. However, the Civil Rights Commission is not the appropriate group.

Since the Commission has no enforcement powers it would serve as just one more body to issue directives to improve the lifestyle for persons in our society. We simply do not need any more reports prepared at Federal expense on the plights faced by these groups.

Mr. Chairman, the attention of the Members is called to these books to my left. Mr. Chairman, would it be out of order to ask the cameras to focus on these stacks of books for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know that the Chair has control over that situation.

Mr. BUTLER. I appreciate the Chair's indulgence. But when I sneak behind them for a minute, the Members will understand it is for public attention and not because I am hiding from them.

The Library of Congress has been able to identify 222 reports prepared by the Congress alone which studied problems of the aged from 1975 through May 1978. According to the Library, during the same period the executive branch prepared 63 reports on the same topic.

The Library of Congress also notes that the executive branch has prepared quite a few more; but because of the volume, they only kept the best 63. We have no idea how many they threw away.

I tried to learn how much this cost the taxpayers. The Library could not even begin to identify the cost of the congressional reports of those prepared in-house by the executive branch. The Library researchers were able to give me some idea. They identified almost $15 million in contracts which were let for studies and reports on the aged since 1975. Many of these reports were specifically designed to study discrimination against the aged. For example, the U.S. Senate Special Committee on Aging issued a report in 1977 entitled, "Discrimination in Employment," addressing the steps to be taken to combat discrimination in aging and retirement.

In 1976, the Committee on Education and Labor issued a report entitled, "Age, Discrimination in Employment," based on oversight hearings.

Numerous reports and studies were generated.

More important, however, than the hundreds of reports and studies prepared by the Congress and the executive branch is the work of the Civil Rights Commission itself in this area. Pursuant to the authority granted by the Age Discrimination Act of 1975, the Commission was directed to prepare a study on the basis of discrimination against the aged. During the last 3 fiscal years, the Commission spent over $1.5 million to produce the recently published 112-page report. If this is any indication of how the Commission plans to use its new authority, I believe we would be irresponsible to award the jurisdiction without more in-depth study as to the real necessity for the Commission to assume this task.

Many of the objections I have raised concerning the Commission's attempt to secure this authority also apply to the extension of the Commission's authority to study the handicapped. Numerous Federal agencies and committees of the Congress which are involved on a full-time basis in addressing the problems which face handicapped persons. Between 1975 and the present, executive branch departments and agencies have produced 51 studies regarding the status of handicapped persons in our society. In addition, committees of the Congress have generated another 80 reports on the same subject. Federal contracts totalled $3,318,064.

In addition, the Office of Handicapped Individuals within HEW is already established as the national clearinghouse for information with respect to handicapped individuals. Certainly, the Civil Rights Commission need not duplicate this function.

The Civil Rights Commission does not need to be involved in every timely issue which is fashionable and generates publicity. For all too long, the Commission has attempted to hop on popular bandwagons which will inevitably attract attention to itself.

I cannot condone another attempt by the Commission to expand its overly broad power base by attempting to secure authority to study these issues. It would be irresponsible for this Congress to expand the jurisdictional mandate of the Commission when the clear fact is that from 1970 to the present, the Commission has totally ignored two areas of its jurisdiction. The subcommittee received testimony which clearly pointed out that from 1970 to the present, the Commission has not issued one report discussing discrimination based on religion or national origin. If the Commission is too busy to concentrate on its jurisdiction as clearly authorized by law, I cannot support efforts to add two more categories which are already thoroughly studied on a full-time basis. The Commission should return to concentrating on the constituencies for which it was established to assist.

I have one final point. During our subcommittee hearings, the Office of Management and Budget testified in support of the President's recommendation in his budget to set the authorization on appropriations for the Commission for fiscal year 1979 at $10,752,000. The subcommittee arbitrarily chose $12 million, designating the difference in the sums to be used for this expanded jurisdiction. It would be premature for us to assume that the Commission either needs this much money or may in fact require more money to adequately study discrimination against these two groups. I urge the House to postpone this attempt to expand the Commission's authority until the Office of Management and Budget can carefully analyze and report on just exactly how much money this expanded authority will cost.

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would be inclined to support the gentleman's amendment if it were not for the fact that the Civil Rights Commission has already been given an enlarged authority by Congress. The Commission started out with its activities being directed toward the interests of those who were discriminated against on the basis of race, color, religion, and national origin. In 1972, we expanded that to give them the authority with respect to sex discrimination, and it seems to me that it is only fair that we likewise extend the authority to provide for jurisdiction to study discrimination against the aged and handicapped.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to reclaim my time.

The gentleman's point is very good, but it comes too late. We have given other Federal agencies this same responsibility. We have given HEW the responsibility for the handicapped, and we have given Federal departments and agencies various responsibilities with respect to the aged.

Now is not the time to start expanding the jurisdiction of the Civil Rights Commission. The Civil Rights Commission was created to ferret out and protect those people who are suffering from racial discrimination. It is getting away from that mandate. It is reading the headlines.

Mr. Chairman, that is wrong. I think they ought to be doing the job they were set up to do and not grabbing off every popular program that comes along.

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I will not yield at this time.

The gentleman well understands, of course, that obviously these are currently popular areas, and that is why the Commission is attempting to secure jurisdiction.

Mr. Chairman, there are 12 feet of studies here on the aged and handicapped, already costing in the neighborhood of $17 million. Now we are asking for $2 million more to have the same thing done all over again, just because the Civil Rights Commission is excited about these programs. There is nothing more they can do but duplicate these studies.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Chairman, I just want to make this one comment: I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER) comes too late. The time to have confined the jurisdiction of the Civil Rights Commission was before we expanded it beyond the subjects of race, color, and national origin. It now has authority in the areas of discrimination as the basis of sex and religion. It would seem to me unfair to omit reference to such areas of widespread discrimination as age and handicap.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER) would delete the new coverage that the subcommittee has added to the jurisdiction of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. This jurisdiction would include Commission review of discrimination on the basis of age and handicap status and, of course, I think it would be a terrible mistake to eliminate that important jurisdiction from Commission review.

We held extensive hearings on the bill, and we heard from people representing these groups as well as representatives from civil rights organizations. They have all recommended that this jurisdiction be included in the authorization of the Civil Rights Commission.

Their only admonishment was that we provide enough money so that this new mandate could be handled without diminishing efforts under the current jurisdiction. These witnesses, Mr. Chairman, testified that people within this status are denied the most fundamental rights, rights to adequate housing, delivery of health services, and access to employment, credit, and insurance. They are frequently shut out from Government services. They are even prevented from exercising their rights to travel and to vote.

The case for including this jurisdiction in the Civil Rights Commission is most compelling, and I urge that we not shut these people out from this additional protection.

I am impressed—and I am sure we all are—with the package exhibited here, the great number of books that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER) has brought with him. I might point out that the fact these books exist would reinforce the case for coverage by the Civil Rights Commission.

Let me remind the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER) and the committee that the Commission is presently authorized to investigate allegations, to study and collect information, and, most importantly, to appraise the laws and policies of the Federal Government and to act as a national clearinghouse to inform the Nation of our effort to meet the goal of equal justice under law for all.

All of these books prove that Commission review of these areas is needed. It does not prove that the work is being done by the Library of Congress or by HEW or by anybody else.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly, strongly urge the defeat of the amendment.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SKUBITZ. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, if I understood the gentleman from Virginia correctly, he pointed out that the discrimination which is alleged against the aged and the handicapped is not being explored and taken care of by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. If this is correct, this bill is just an example of how bureaucracy keeps growing and growing and growing. A job was given to an agency 5 years ago or 6 years ago and it continues to grow and grow and spawn and spawn. Then we talk in this body here about the growth of the bureaucracy. We ought to do something about it. To me, the gentleman from Virginia is absolutely correct. The time has come to stop delegating more authority to them and to start putting an end to some of them.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, I strongly disagree with the observations of the gentleman. All of the books that the gentleman from Virginia has brought before us emphasize the need for needed assistance to these groups who are not protected now.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PANETTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the fact is that the Civil Rights Commission has absolutely no enforcement powers whatsoever. HEW has enforcement power, the Department of Health, Education, and Labor has enforcement powers. These are the departments that are going to enforce the law. The role of the Civil Rights Commission is purely and simply oversight in these areas, and nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, I will say to my colleague on the other side of the aisle that the very fact that the other agencies have the enforcement power today, either they are making their own studies today in order to create regulations which they cannot enforce, or they are acting without information. And something ought to be done about that.

Mr. DRINAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I serve with the distinguished gentleman from Florida, our colleague (Mr. PEPPER), on the Select Committee on Aging, and I am certain that the gentleman from Florida (Mr. PEPPER) would reinforce what the gentleman from California (Mr. EDWARDS) has said; namely, that there is an acute need for additional basic research and recommendations with respect to discrimination against the elderly and against the handicapped.

The gentleman from Virginia makes the point that there are already a lot of studies. His argument proves too much. There are many studies with regard to all of the other things that the Civil Rights Commission has to investigate. There are more studies than the studies accumulated here based on race and color and religion and sex and national origin.

Is the gentleman suggesting that, because there are more studies, the U.S. Commission should be deprived of this right? This is a new era for the elderly and for people who are discriminated against.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRINAN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question of whether the gentleman from Virginia is suggesting that the presence of these studies indicates that additional studies of these same studies are not indicated, I will state that the gentleman from Massachusetts is misinterpreting my remarks. I do think they are appropriate. I neglected to point out, when I was speaking before the House and referring to all of these books, that these were all we could get our hands on on short notice. I have, however, 4 volumes of printouts of listing all the studies since 1975.

Mr. DRINAN. Mr. Chairman, if I could reclaim my time, the gentleman is proving my case for me, that the age discrimination study, which is the one study the U.S. Commission has done on this topic, which was issued in December 1977 was a very valuable, extraordinarily helpful document on which, in part, the legislation passed this year by the Congress was based.

We are in a new era, Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, when it is now unlawful to dismiss anybody on the basis of age until that person is 70. We need all of the investigation and all of the research that we can get in this era.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, we have many, many statutes now at the Federal and State level that protect the rights of the handicapped. We need the U.S. Commission, with all of its nonpartisan, objective prestige, to focus attention on the rights of handicapped, and those rights are not being observed or implemented.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think this House should resoundingly defeat the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased and proud to join the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee who is handling this measure, the gentleman from California (Mr. EDWARDS), and my friend and distinguished colleague on the Select Committee on Aging, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DRINAN), in opposition to this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER) has exhibited for our observation here all this pile of books. I am sure he has read all those books and commends them to our consideration. I am sure he has found them informative, and that he has derived from a study of those books so much information that he advises us today to follow the advice of these books, so that the gentleman does not want to include the aged and the handicapped as groups which are protected in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, we appreciate the advice of the distinguished gentleman as to how much literature is available on this subject. The issue is not literature; it is not learning; it is not philosophy. The aged and the handicapped want protection. They want to have a tribunal to which complaints may be made when they are discriminated against, as they are in so many instances in the field of education, mental health care, housing, and employment. How many scholarships or fellowships do the Members know about which have been extended to the aged, who also want to go to college or to universities?

In the field of employment, I wish the gentleman from Virginia would find somewhere in those books some guidance or some answer to the problem of unemployment among the aged people of this country.

Mr. Chairman, everyone knows that when one gets up above 40 years of age, as a matter of fact, it is difficult to get a job in industry. When one gets to be 65, it is almost impossible.

It took legislation by this Congress, approved by the President this year, to ban the mandatory discharge of people in this country for no offense except the good fortune of getting to be 65 years of age.

Mr. Chairman, those books or those studies did not prevent those worthy men and women all over America from being discharged from their duties which they were performing well, simply because they got to be 65-years of age. It was the Civil Rights Commission's distinguished Chairman, Dr. Arthur Flemming, who recommended to me that there be included in the authority of the Commission the right to investigate and to take whatever action they could to protect the aged and the handicapped of this country.

As a result, Mr. Chairman, Congress has a good record of protecting the aged and the handicapped. We made a very salutary advance in that area last year. This is another step forward so that the aged and the handicapped of this country will know that the Congress of the United States has put the cloak of national protection around them and the morality of their security about them.

I would hope, therefore, that our colleague would not retard our progress but, rather, see that it is accelerated by adding specifically the aged and the handicapped to the protection of this law, which now says there should be no discrimination on account of sex, race, religion, or national origin.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure, from the record of this distinguished House, that that will be the action of this body.

As my colleagues well know, the purpose of this bill is to extend the life of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights for 5 years, and expand jurisdiction of the Commission to include discrimination based on age and handicapped status.

The U.S. Commission of Civil Rights in its 20 years of existence has earned a tremendous amount of respect from the American people. The Commission has been involved in numerous short- and long-term studies, of such issues as internal discrimination in labor unions, sex discrimination in pensions and insurace programs, and an overview of the state of civil rights. Its reports and findings provide a plethora of information not only to Congress, but also to every Federal, State, and local agency, and to the American public. This dissemination has furthered every citizen's basic understanding of his or her individual civil rights.

Although this reputation has been built through the Commission's examination of racial and ethnic discrimination, it is extremely well suited to add age and handicap to its areas of authority. The Commission unquestionably has proven to be a valuable arm of the Federal Government.

Mr. Chairman, the new jurisdiction in H.R. 12432 for the Commission to investigate discrimination based on age and handicapped status is well founded. Ageism is as odious as racism or sexism. Discrimination on the basis of age or handicap is just as arbitrary, unjust, and inhumane as discrimination on the basis of race, sex, religion or national origin. It is time that older people and handicapped individuals received the same watchful protection against arbitrary treatment as others whose civil rights have been systematically violated.

In 1975 Congress passed as part of the Older Americans Act Amendments of 1975 the Age Discrimination Act, which banned "unreasonable" age-based discrimination in most federally financed programs. The U.S. Civil Rights Commission was directed to study age discrimination in Federal programs and recommend to the Congress and the President how best to implement the act. The Civil Rights Commission released its excellent report in January.

The study found that "barriers erected between persons falling within particular groups—especially children and older persons—and services financed by the Federal Government have had and are continuing to have a serious adverse impact on the lives of children and older persons who need these services * * * "

In its report, the Civil Rights Commission recommended a number of changes in the Age Discrimination Act of 1975. Those changes were unanimously endorsed this spring by the Select Committee on Aging, which I have the honor to chair, and then added through an amendment offered by Congressman BIAGGI to the bill extending the Older Americans Act. That bill, H.R. 12255, passed the House by a vote of 361 to 6. Also included in that bill was a directive to the Commission to examine racial and ethnic discrimination in Federal aging programs.

The Commission's study on age discrimination is important not only for its findings and recommendations, but also for the expertise that the Commission's staff has acquired as a result. The study has left the Commission with core staff who understand and can analyze complaints of discrimination based on age.

A few of my colleagues have contended that the inclusion of provisions dealing with these types of discriminatory practices would be duplicative and constitute a threat to existing Federal agencies.

However, I do not see either of these developments occuring. Instead, I see a cooperative body engaged in the vital functions of factfinding and advice to the Congress and the President, so that they may remain well informed as to the prevalence of this cruel and insidious type of discrimination. Only through the availability of objective and timely information can remedial policies be developed and implemented.

Nor is the existence of the House's Select Committee on Aging, or our counterpart panel in the other body, an excuse for denying the Commission this extended authority. The Aging Committee looks forward to working with the Commission in this complex area. As chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging, I have introduced separate legislation which would accomplish exactly the same goal.

Mr. Chairman, it will be a tragedy if the jurisdiction of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights is not extended to include age discrimination. Protection from age discrimation is a fundamental civil right. I hope my colleagues will join me in opposing this amendment which would delete age and handicap discrimination from H.R. 12432.

H.R. 12432 should be overwhelmingly approved in its present form by the House.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield with pleasure to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the chairman of the Select Committee on Aging. I commend the subcommittee for the important work they have done.

Mr. Chairman, it would be different if the handicapped and the elderly had the same access to buildings, simple things like that, buildings, employment, educational opportunities. If everything was equal and fine and right, we would not need those two words added. I think it is very, very important for the millions of Americans who have been ignored concerning their own personal rights, and I hope we resoundingly defeat this amendment.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentlewoman's remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

(At the request of Mr. GILMAN and by unanimous consent, Mr. PEPPER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. I want to commend the gentleman from Florida for proposing and advocating this important aspect of the Civil Rights Commission to allow the aged and the handicapped to have some body, some agency, that will respect and protect their rights.

We are just beginning in the Congress to recognize the need to do something substantive for older Americans and for the handicapped, and we are beginning to spend substantial dollars in that direction. It is extremely important that we have an agency that will oversee their rights and make certain that they are protected.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to address the amendment offered by my colleague from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER). This amendment seeks to eliminate the provision included in the Civil Rights Commission Act of 1978 which allows the Commission to enlarge its jurisdiction to include cases arising from discrimination on the basis of age or handicap.

I am opposed to the gentleman's amendment because the scope of discrimination transcends race, and the insidious attitudinal barriers which arise because of age and handicapping conditions find their way into all aspects of the elderly and handicapped's lives. When the Commission was first established, the problem of racism was the most noticeable and pervasive form of discrimination. The Commission has done an admirable job in pointing out and attempting to eradicate the sources and manifestations of prejudice; and yet, in the years following the work of the Commission, other forms of discrimination have come to the forefront: discrimination on the basis of sex, religion, age, and handicap. This is a sad commentary on the state of human relations, and in America today, we must continue to place a high priority on diversity and pluralism. An amendment such as this one, in essence, denied the validity and presence of discrimination on the basis of age and handicap.

The Congress has contributed much to the cause of liberating the aged and the handicapped. Through mandates which address job policies and retirement policies, the elderly have the option to continue working even though they have reached the traditional age of retirement. The handicapped may now have access to the programs which had been formerly closed to them. Yet, despite the mandates and programs that have been established by legislation, many instances of discrimination still continue to occur. For example, we were recently informed of a case in the Securities and Exchange Commission which involves a handicapped individual who had been passed up for promotion, and to whom many of the physical barriers surrounding him were insurmountable.

The elderly face no less horrible circumstances. Many of them are denied jobs, privileges and necessities simply because they are old. This reasoning reflects poorly upon the caliber of our society, and would severely restrict the scope of the Civil Rights Commission.

The Civil Rights Commission should be allowed to address the problems of various kinds of discrimination, and its jurisdiction should be enlarged in this manner.

It is for that reason that I commend the gentleman for his efforts, and urge my colleagues to support the measure.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the gentleman for his able statement.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Very briefly, Mr. Chairman, I think there is some confusion with regard to the role of the Civil Rights Commission and the performance that it has had as a Commission. It was established in 1957 by then President Eisenhower for the purpose of oversight on the enforcement effort, to look at the civil rights area and determine the needs, what the complaints were, and what needed to be done in these areas. It has continued to effectively perform that role throughout the years from 1957.

We have had a large number of laws in the civil rights area and these laws are enforced by a myriad of agencies and departments—sometimes effectively and sometimes not so effectively. The purpose of the Civil Rights Commission is not simply to look at the law enforcement side, but also to look at the impact on the community. We have had enforcement in the civil rights area which has been arbitrary and abusive. The Commission does not just simply look at Government's role but it is responsible to oversee what is happening to the public and present an objective picture of what is happening. That is the role it performs, and it is an invaluable role in terms of enforcement and public information.

I found it particularly valuable as director of the Office for Civil Rights, to have the Civil Rights Commission continually review the situation and be able to report directly to the public.

The second point I would make is that if indeed we are talking about the "Civil Rights" Commission, when it comes to the issues involving the aged, handicapped and women, we are talking about civil rights. That is the purpose of the Civil Rights Commission, to look at all areas of discrimination. We cannot begin to eliminate arbitrarily areas of discrimination from their jurisdiction and maintain an effective Commission. They perform an important role, and they ought to continue to perform that role in all areas of civil rights.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I think that, as usual in debate we have lost our congressional compass. The gentleman from Virginia, the State of Jefferson and a great many other of our Founding Fathers, suggests that there is a proper role for Government, but that the particular agency in question is going beyond the bounds of proper activities, and beyond the bounds of need, if I understood his amendment. He has offered us a graphic exhibition of what we all know exists in almost every facet of governmental activities—duplication, waste, unneeded studies, more bureaucrats on the payroll than are necessary.

Everytime any move is suggested that might cut spending, all the bleeding hearts come foward and say, "You are mortally wounding whoever is supposed to be the recipients of this or that particular study."

Those who support cutbacks in Government are not against the poor or old people or the handicapped. One would think that the gentleman from Virginia had offered an amendment to cut $20 billion out of the social security system or to dismantle HEW. What he is saying is that for these groups the job has been done and is being done by other Federal agencies.

I do not like to bring in personal illustrations, but my mother-in-law is 71 years old. Her husband died a good many years ago, and she has lived on social security and a small income. She raised three kids alone. She is a lady of great personal resources and has a keen interest in government. Many times when I talk with my mother-in-law, the same discussion comes up.

"Why can't Congress help older people by cutting down on inflation and by cutting down on the unnecessary spending that drives up the price of everything that every elderly person in this country needs?" is her question.

One of the ways in which we can cut down on spending is by doing away with such unnecessary spending and duplication as is addressed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER).

If we mean what we say when our newsletters go out and if we mean what we say when we go back and campaign, if we mean that we want to cut the budget, here is one small $2 million we can cut in this Commission. It will not hurt anyone and it will help those old folks who are standing in line at the A&P trying to make their dollar stretch for the groceries they need.

Here is where the blame lies, with the people on this House floor, with those Members who go right on voting for every proposition that spends money thus robbing the handicapped, the aged, and the poor of the value of their small incomes and savings.

I wonder where your concerns really lie?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

I will not take the 5 minutes, but I oppose the amendment.

I just want to ask the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER), and the other people who seem to be so determined that this is a waste of money and that it is a duplication this question: if that is the case, then why is this bill including the jurisdiction that would be cut by this amendment, supported by every single national organization of senior citizens? They include the National Council of Senior Citizens, the American Association of Retired Persons, the National Retired Teachers Association in addition it is supported by the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and the League of Women Voters.

If their problems are so well handled by other agencies, as the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from Virginia represented, then why is it the people who are best qualified to know that is, those who represent the older Americans, do not think so? Perhaps they could explain that to me.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I think the reason is—the gentleman asked for a reason and I think it is clear—I do not think they know. Nobody would dream that if there are that many reports, that someone would ask for $2 million more for another report. That is what the problem is.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I suggest they know better than most of us in this Chamber what is going on that affects them. Hardly a week passes but that I do not have brought to me some case of some senior citizen in my district who is not being treated with equality, who is being discriminated against. It tears me apart to see people who have spent their lives to bring up a generation of Americans ignored and neglected.

Mrs. FENWICK. If the gentleman will yield further, that is absolutely right. That happens every day, and my mail reflects it too. But the point is we are not enforcing the laws we have got. How many of us listen to those people and read our mail from those people? Why do we not say: "What is going on here that you dare treat people like this?"

Mr. SEIBERLING. I suggest the Civil Rights Commission is the best agency to find out why, in answer to the gentlewoman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. EDWARDS of California) there were—ayes 19, noes 19.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

Messrs. STEIGER, O'BRIEN, BROWN of Michigan, and ENGLISH changed their vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendments were rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BUTLER

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. BUTLER: Page 4, line 9, after "Sec. 106." insert "(a)" and on page 4, after line 13, insert the following:

(b) No sums made available to the Commission shall be used at any time, directly or indirectly, to undertake to influence the passage or defeat of any legislation by the Congress of the United States or by any State or local legislative bodies, except when the Commission is requested to give an opinion.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the desk.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment seeks to include in the legislative charter for the Civil Rights Commission language which would prohibit members of the Commission, its staff, or contractees from engaging in efforts to influence passage or defeat of any legislation in the Congress or a State or local legislative body.

In no way is it my intention to prohibit the Commission from carrying out its congressionally mandated duty of studying and collecting information and transmitting that information to the President and the Congress. Nor is this intended to prohibit the Commission from responding to a request for an opinion by a Member of Congress or executive branch official.

The purpose is simple. It is to insure that Federal tax money will not be used to lobby legislators. It certainly was never the intent of Congress to have the Civil Rights Commission or its contractees engage in lobbying activities. The amendment makes it clear that the abuses of any language prohibiting such activity will not be a license to engage in such conduct.

During our hearings in subcommittee, one witness testified that he believed representatives of the Commission engaged in lobbying State legislators requesting medicaid funds for abortions. In addition, one of my constituents has sent me a June 1973 pamphlet which was sent to her by the Civil Rights Commission when the Commonwealth of Virginia was considering the equal rights amendment. The pamphlet states:

Ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment is an important and appropriate means of alleviating sex discrimination—just as the adoption of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments was vital to the cause of racial equality.

Moreover, the October 12, 1977, New York Times notes that on the eve of the Supreme Court arguments on the controversial Bakke case, the Commission issued a 12-page statement endorsing affirmative action programs in professional schools, including the use of numerically based admission programs.

All of these actions are subtle, and yet I am sure that my constituents do not want Federal tax dollars to be used by this unelected group to attempt to determine the outcome of such important debates.

This amendment seeks only to do what this Congress has done in the past with several agencies, including Treasury, Postal Service, and, just 2 weeks ago, the Legal Services Corporation.

The amendment would in no way limit the Commission or its grantees from testifying, or advising whenever asked, before any governmental body. Adoption of this amendment would insure that there is no misunderstanding on the part of the Commission, its employees, or contractees of their responsibilities and obligations as Federal employees, even though they are supposed to be independent and bipartisan.

Some have alleged that 18 U.S.C. 1913, which forbids lobbying by Federal employees, is a sufficient deterrent for the Commission. I do not agree. This statute covers only appropriated funds, does not include contractees and does not reach the State legislatures. With the current turmoil over the ratification of ERA and Federal funding of abortions, the State legislatures are a most inviting target for potential abuse and should be covered.

In the past, the Commission and its employees have generally conducted themselves in the professional manner. The amendment is not to reflect in any way on the work of the Commission or its analyses of important issues which have faced this Nation over the past 20 years. I am simply urging that the Commission know its role, and I believe this language will make it quite clear and understandable.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the proposed amendment is unnecessary and unwise. Mr. BUTLER, himself, has acknowledged there is little evidence to support the conclusion that the Commission has been lobbying. Even if such lobbying was being done, 18 U.S.C. 1913 is available to prosecute violators—that criminal statute prohibits Government employees or officers from lobbying the Congress.

In addition, the proposed amendment may cause more harm than the hypothetical "evil" it seeks to correct. As presently drafted, the amendment works to gut the Commission's most important function—its authority to make findings and recommendations. Without this authority, the Commission's courageous voice will be mute.

The proposed amendment does great mischief, and I am afraid that its effect would be to silence the Commission's courageous voice. The Commission's charter has never granted authority to its officers or employees to lobby the national or State governments. Any lobbying is clearly outside its scope of power. Furthermore, I am sure the gentleman will agree that except for the not too strong allegation of one witness, there is no evidence to support the conclusion that the Commission has been lobbying; thus, the need for such an amendment is not clearly supported by the facts.

Such activity by the Commission is not only violative of its charter, but a violation of 18 U.S.C. 1913—that provision sets forth a criminal prohibition against Government employees or officers lobbying the Congress. If the gentleman feels the prohibition is inadequate to reach the kinds of "lobbying" with which he is concerned, I suggest rather than amending the Commission's charter, he should be proposing amendments to title 18. Particularly since I am sure he would want such prohibitions to apply to all Government employees or officers and not be selectively enforced against the Commission only.

This amendment should not be supported because it could destroy the Commission's most effective and significant function—its authority to make findings and recommendations.

Section 104 of the Commission's charter grants it limited authority which, in effect, makes it a public, education/information resource. It is unique among the Federal agencies in this regard. Part of its authority, indeed its most significant function, is its power to make findings and recommendations "at such times as the Commission, the Congress, or the President shall deem desirable."

Broadly construed, the proposed amendment would prevent the Commission and its State Advisory Committees from issuing any reports, since the selection of the material published could be viewed as an attempt to "indirectly" influence executive or legislative action—even though such reports contain nothing but statistics and factual material. More narrowly construed, it would allow the Commission and its Advisory Committees to issue reports but preclude them from making findings, conclusions, and recommendations.

In performing its work, the Commission must, of necessity, speak to existing or pending statutes or executive orders. Often the Commission has recommended legislative or executive action to improve civil rights enforcement. It has no power to enforce such recommendations—that decision is for the Congress and the President. Admittedly, both branches have frequently implemented such recommendations, and that is to the Commission's credit; clearly, we are not suggesting it be penalized for doing its job effectively.

On the local level, reports issued by State Advisory Committees (SAC's) and testimony by their members before governmental bodies have provided State legislators and executives with the kinds of information necessary to assess civil rights efforts within their State. More importantly, these local Committees supply the raw data to the Commission which enables it to establish policy and program guidelines for its future efforts.

For 21 years, the Commission has been our national conscience, and the SAC's its eyes and ears. This carefully designed network has enabled the Commission to consistently home in on our successes and failures and to provide us with the kinds of alternatives necessary to the goal of equal justice under law. This proposed amendment will greatly diminish the Commission's effectiveness, and I urge a "no" vote.

Mr. Chairman, section 1913, to which reference was made, reads as follows:

No part of the money appropriated by any enactment of Congress shall, in the absence of express authorization by Congress, be used directly or indirectly to pay for any personal service, advertisement, telegram, telephone, letter, printed or written matter, or other device, intended or designed to influence in any manner a Member of Congress, to favor or oppose, by vote or otherwise, any legislation or appropriation by Congress, whether before or after the introduction of any bill or resolution proposing such legislation or appropriation; but this shall not prevent officers or employees of the United States or of its departments or agencies from communicating to Members of Congress on the request of any Member or to Congress, through the proper official channels, requests for legislation or appropriations which they deem necessary for the efficient conduct of the public business.

Whoever, being an officer or employee of the United States or of any department or agency thereof, violates or attempts to violate this section, shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both; and after notice and hearing by the superior officer vested with the power of removing him, shall be removed from office or employment.

June 25, 1948, c. 645, 62 Stat. 792.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I hate to interrupt the gentleman, but I think this is a good time to make the legislative history perfectly clear that it is not our intention by this amendment to limit the traditional practices of the Civil Rights Commission in distributing its findings in whatever fashion is appropriate.

What I object to and what I think most people would object to is taking sides on legislative matters before a State and lobbying in that area.

Section 1913, to which the gentleman referred, does not prohibit this sort of lobbying, as the gentleman knows.

The gentleman has suggested that perhaps the appropriate thing to do is to amend title 18.

I would ask the gentleman this question: Now that we are undertaking a comprehensive revision of the criminal code, would he agree to extending the provisions of section 1913 when the criminal code comes before our committee to include State legislatures as well as the Congress?

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I believe that that would be a very new and wide change in the law. I would not and I am sure the gentleman would not suggest that any of us here should make such a rather radical suggestion without the advantage of study and hearings in some depth.

However, I would like to point out to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER) that this suggestion that the Commission has been lobbying in State matters cannot be supported. One witness rather faintly referred to this matter; and if the gentleman has any evidence that the employees of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights have been lobbying in States and local legislatures, then I think the gentleman owes it to this body to bring the evidence before us.

Mr. Chairman, that apparently is the sole basis for his amendment, and there is no evidence that this has ever taken place.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think this amendment would be disastrous. I hope it will be defeated.

I worked for the Commission for over 10 years as a volunteer. Why should we fear any kind of information that they may want to give us? We should encourage the Civil Rights Commission, rather than to discourage it, to bring us information so that we can do a better job here in the Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. EDWARDS) has expired

(On request of Mr. BAUMAN and by unanimous consent, Mr. EDWARDS of California was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I did not come prepared, with evidence, to defend the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER). However, I distinctly recall last year, prior to the Supreme Court's ruling on the issue of the Hyde amendment's constitutionality, that at the appropriate time there came from the Commission a letter and a lengthy report attacking the Hyde amendment on the ground that it was unconstitutional, and possible violations by the amendment of the Civil Rights Acts were suggested.

The letter and staff report miraculously appeared here on the floor at the time of the debate. I can rummage through my files and find it, perhaps.

That was an advisory opinion, but it amounted to blatant lobbying on crucial legislation with taxpayers' funds.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, I disagree with the gentleman.

As I recall, that particular document came from the Civil Rights Commission at the specific request of one of the Members of Congress or of one of the committees. At the time, as I recall, no one here objected to it and called it lobbying, as the gentleman from Maryland has called it.

Mr. BAUMAN. I will say it appeared in the press simultaneously with a lot of press releases from the Commission. It just happened to occur I suppose. I doubt anyone does not think the letter and report were a carefully contrived political effort by the Commission to scuttle the Hyde amendment and that to me is lobbying.

Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER).

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is a long overdue addition to the legislative charter for the Civil Rights Commission. I supported language similar to this in the Legal Services Corporation appropriation, and I believe a firm statement by Congress regarding this practice represents a wise policy toward all Federal tax-supported agencies which have been designed to be independent and nonpartisan.

The amendment is a clear and concise statement which makes it clear to all parties that direct attempts to influence the legislative process are clearly outside the responsibilities and prerogatives of the Commission and its employees. It would in no way prohibit the Commission from performing its duties mandated in the statute. The only intention is to prohibit the Commission from straying too far in support of its positions.

Consistently, the Commission has adopted very definite positions on extremely controversial issues. This is, of course, part of their function. However, it is not the Commission's function to subsequently advocate their conclusion or pressure Members of Congress or, in appropriate cases, State or local legislators, to adopt these conclusions.

Opponents of this amendment argue that it is unnecessary; however, I do not agree. We should adopt this language in authorization for other independent agencies. It does not penalize the Commission; rather, it merely addresses a problem before it occurs.

I do not believe this amendment will tie the hands of the Commission. Instead, we are making a firm statement to our constituents that we recognize that Federal tax dollars should not be used to influence legislators on the very emotional and controversial issues which the Commission studies.

Over the past 20 years, the Commission has conducted itself for the most part in a very professional manner. Addition of this language to the Commission's charter will insure this posture continues and will make it certain that the Commission will not compromise its independence and nonpartisanship.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BUTLER).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BUTLER) there were—ayes 27; noes 25.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 159, noes 125, not voting 148, as follows:

Mr. LONG of Louisiana changed his vote from "aye" to "no."

Mr. FUQUA changed his vote from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. FOLEY) having assumed the Chair, Mr. DE LA GARZA, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 12432, to extend the Commission on Civil Rights for 5 years, to authorize appropriations for the Commission, to effect certain technical changes to comply with changes in the law, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON BANKING, FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS, TO SIT ON FRIDAY, AUGUST 4, 1978, AND FRIDAY, AUGUST 11, 1978, WHILE HOUSE IS IN SESSION

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, be permitted to sit on Friday, August 4, 1978, and Friday, August 11, 1978, despite the House being in session, for the consideration of the Stanton bill on the Federal Reserve System and related matters.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman can assure us there will be no markup of any legislation; is that correct?

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, absolutely, there will be no votes and no markups and, indeed, an effort will be made to permit as many Members as possible to be on the floor.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, the gentleman can assure us these were witnesses called before the committee knew we would be in session?

Mr. REUSS. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's comments, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. REUSS)?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. DEVINE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. DEVINE. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this 1 minute for the purpose of inquiring of the acting majority leader of the schedule for the balance of the week, if any, and the following week.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEVINE. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Speaker, this concludes this week's business. Next week the House will go in at noon Monday. We have two bills on the Suspension Calendar, H.R. 9998, Ocean Shipping Act of 1978; and H.R. 5044, duties suspension on strontium nitrate. Votes on suspensions will occur at the end of both suspensions.

Then we will have the rule and general debate only on two bills:

H.R. 12514, foreign aid authorizations for fiscal year 1979, open rule, 3 hours; and H.R. 12931, foreign aid appropriations for fiscal year 1979, general debate only.

Going to Tuesday, the House will meet at 10 a.m. First, we will have the call of the Private Calendar. We will then have votes on two suspensions: H.R. 12972, elimination of work disincentives under social security; and H.J. Res. 963, POW MIA National Recognition Day. We will vote on both suspensions at the end of both suspensions.

We will then go back to the bill H.R. 12514, foreign aid authorizations, fiscal year 1979. We will have votes on amendments and the bill. We will complete consideration that day on that bill.

On Wednesday, the House will meet at 10 a.m. on the bill H.R. 12931, foreign aid appropriations, fiscal year 1979, for votes on amendments and the bill, to complete consideration.

On Thursday, the House will meet at 10 a.m. on the bill H.R. 13635, defense appropriations, fiscal year 1979.

On Friday, the House is to meet at 9 a.m. and will complete consideration of that bill, H.R. 13635, defense appropriations, fiscal year 1979.

Mr. Speaker, the House will adjourn by 3 p.m. on Fridays and by 7 p.m. on all other days except Wednesdays.

Conference reports may be brought up at any time and any further program will be announced later.

Mr. DEVINE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE TO FILE REPORT

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture may have until midnight tonight, July 28, 1978, to file a report on the bill H.R. 11122, the Agricultural Land Retention Act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule on Wednesday of next week be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, JULY 31, 1978

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today, it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon on Monday, July 31, 1978.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

(Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I stand before this body as a lifelong farmer in an effort to defend and preserve the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

Although I have some reservations about the current operation of the Department, circumstances dictate the need for the preservation of the status quo, at least for the moment.

According to all indicators, a turf battle of the bureaucrats is in full swing, and the President and his top advisers have come down in favor of the aggressors against agriculture.

Can you believe that the State Department would like to take over the foreign agriculture service?

They apparently feel that they are doing such a masterful job throughout the world that they can assume an agrarian role. This, despite the fact that most of the striped pants set would not know a corncob from a cornflower.

Would you believe that the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, Joseph Califano, thinks his organization is so efficient that it should also assume agricultural roles? His Department is the one which Mr. Califano tells us lets some $7 or $8 billion of our tax dollars drop through the cracks in his organizational structure. That is more than twice as much in absolute waste to consumer services as was estimated for a program requested by the striking farmers who visited all of our offices this past winter and spring.

The Department of the Interior would like a piece of the action. Miffed because of a carving up of some of its departmental responsibilities after the creation of the Department of Energy, Secretary Andrus and his bureaucratic top bananas would like a slice of the agricultural pie in order to justify their numerical strength come budget time, and to enhance their prestigious position in the governmental pecking order.

There are others equally as ambitious for portions of the Department.

Most people in rural America believe the Department of Agriculture should be farm oriented and working for the farmer. This has not been the case in the current administration. We have an Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, Carol Foreman who is a strong consumer advocate. We resent it when the Department of Agriculture operates as agriculture's policeman, instead of sincerely working for our benefit. However we feel the producers of America's food, and the entire Nation, will be best served by keeping such agencies as the Soil Conservation Service, the Forest Service, and others, within this Department that has a long history of experience, that has developed expertise, and that comes nearer to understanding the needs and the interests of America's food producers than any other Department.

I have introduced a resolution, House Resolution 1258, which pertains to the proposed diminution of the Department of Agriculture's duties. After consultation with respected advisers of every political persuasion during the 4th of July district work break, I have decided that additional measures need to be taken in order to assure the executive branch that we in the Congress are sincerely concerned about the welfare of our great agricultural industry.

Through this speech and by letter, I am respectfully asking the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, Mr. THOMAS S. FOLEY, to request the General Accounting Office to study the structure of the Department and recommend any needed legislative change.

Such a study should be the basis for legislation which would strengthen the Department.

I would hope that a study of the agricultural needs of the Nation by the General Accounting Office would be accomplished through consultation with responsible community leaders from both the private and public sectors. Respected governmental study groups such as the Brookings Institution and the American Enterprise Institution should participate from areas where large Federal landholdings and irrigation projects have an effect on non-Federal tax bases. The most important input should come from the farmers themselves and from those who derive their livelihood from the land. Key members of the Agricultural Committees of both Houses would be essential along with representatives of the Government Operations Committees.

It is too late in this session of the Congress to do more than put the administration on notice that the Congress is not going to allow massive changes in authority. From a practical standpoint I would hope that during the First Session of the 96th Congress the study would be completed and ready for implementation.

I urge my colleagues to join with me in this effort so the President and his Cabinet members are put on notice that the agricultural areas of this Nation do not intend to see divisive action taken without total congressional sanction.

Meanwhile, I want to warn the would be dissectors of the department that we in the Congress will carefully watch their every action. Title 5 of the United States Code, sections 901 through 906 must be observed fully and the letter of the law adhered to.

THE OLYMPIC GAMES SHOULD NOT BE USED AS POLITICAL TOOL

(Mr. RYAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, the suggestion has recently been made in the editorial columns of the national media that the United States withdraw from the 1980 Olympic Games in protest to the unjust sentences given last week to the Soviet dissidents Anatoly Scharansky, Aleksandr Ginzburg, and Yuri Orlov.

While I agree that such clear abridgements of basic human rights merit a strong and immediate response from our country, I question the use of the Olympic Games as a political tool. There are several reasons for my concern. First, I believe other more tangible and responsible means of registering our abhorrence to these actions are available, such as President Carter's discontinuation of computer sales to the Soviet Union. Second, to prohibit American participation in the Olympic games would deprive many hardworking American men and women athletes of the opportunity to compete on the highest amateur level after years of grueling preparation.

My most serious objection to a 1980 withdrawal, however, is that the United States would be legitimizing the use of the Olympic games as a political tool. In 1972 and again in 1976 we criticized other countries for attempting to use the games for political purposes. To withdraw from the games in 1980 would not only lend fuel to the ever reoccurring claims of American hypocrisy but also become a precedent for other countries to use in future games. Thus, a withdrawal might not only destroy the 1980 Olympics, but also imperil the viability of all future Olympics.

The threat would not only be political but financial as well. With the games open to political interruption, no responsible city could reasonably risk the financial commitment necessary to stage the Olympic games. As Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradly so clearly demonstrated last week, this commitment is difficult enough to justify today.

But my objection to United States politicization of the Olympics goes beyond monetary arguments to a deeper philosophical opposition. The International Olympics were devised as an arena where athletes could compete on a purely athletic level devoid of nationalistic and political considerations. While the games have not always lived up to this goal, the ideal remains. A United States withdrawal from the 1980 games would institutionalize the ugly political usage of the Olympics, discarding the ideal of competition transcending political belief and action as another relic of the idealism of days gone by. Even if the Olympics managed to somehow survive such political turmoil, the tragedy of the 1972 Munich slaughter would most likely cease being the exception and become the rule. Rather than condoning such political manipulation, we should at all times be working to discourage such activity.

I hope that we can reject this temptation to irresponsibly react to Soviet injustices through the Olympic games and instead employ more tangible and effective diplomatic measures.

NUCLEAR WASTE MANAGEMENT ACT OF 1978

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOLEY). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. GOLDWATER) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that will help our Nation deal with the growing problem of nuclear wastes. This issue is of considerable importance to the Nation, as we must be able to adequately dispose of our nuclear wastes if we are to continue to depend on nuclear energy for a significant portion of our future energy needs. Our Nation must face this problem now or we may have to face the prospect of closing our nuclear plants in the near future. We have already been forced to limit construction of new nuclear plants in some areas of the country due to the public's perception of the nuclear waste problem, and we must act now to assure that this situation gets better, not worse.

My legislation, the Nuclear Waste Management Act of 1978, will help us avoid the frightening prospect of an energy shortage, which a nuclear slowdown would surely entail, by providing the timely establishment of needed facilities to store nuclear wastes. This bill directs the Secretary of Energy to construct and operate a permanent Federal research, development and demonstration repository for the storage of nuclear wastes. The key element of this bill is that it sets a strict timetable for the completion of this job, recognizing the urgency of the problem. Site selection is to be based on the many studies conducted to date on nuclear waste disposal, as well as on specific site evaluations yet to be completed. The demonstration facility must become operational by September 30, 1985.

Under this bill, the many groups and individuals interested in this project will be able to provide their views for consideration in the siting, design, and construction of the waste repository. The bill recognizes that the States and other parties must play a significant role in the formulation of any effective nuclear waste disposal program. My legislation formally recognizes the role of the States, and gives the meaningful opportunity to comment on and influence any actions taken by the Secretary under this bill.

In order to receive the most effective input from other interested parties such as industrial organizations, professional societies, and environmental groups, this legislation establishes a Nuclear Waste Management Advisory Committee, which shall study and advise the Secretary of Energy on all facets of nuclear waste management programs and technologies.

I believe that it is in the best interests of our Nation to insure that a permanent repository is constructed now and that it is in operation within the time frame established in this bill. We need action rather than studies. As I have recently stated in a letter to the Secretary of Energy on this matter, I cannot help but note that we have seen a seemingly unending series of studies, reviews, and evaluation of this subject within the last several years, each ending with several laudible recommendations or goals that somehow get sidetracked before they are achieved. Endless paper studies do not seem to me to be the solution to the nuclear waste disposal problem. What we need instead is to establish a research, development and demonstration program that will get this job done, and to my mind that includes construction and operation of a repository in a timely manner. The bill does exactly that.

I find it ironic that despite its rhetoric on this subject, the administration has within the past year let the deadline for the construction of a permanent repository slip a total of 3 years, to 1988. We cannot afford this kind of approach.

A number of my colleagues in both Houses of Congress have recently introduced various bills intended to remedy various aspects of the nuclear waste problem. These bills include proposals such as expanding the licensing authority of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to include waste management facilities, and establishing a new governmental entity to operate our nuclear waste program. However, no legislation introduced in the House to date will do what the bill I am submitting today will accomplish—require the Secretary of Energy, by a specific date, to build a facility for permanent disposal of our nuclear wastes.

We in the Congress must recognize that the principal national issue of concern with nuclear energy is waste disposal. I believe that this legislation provides the tools to allow us to adequately address this concern. For this reason, I urge that my colleagues support the bill and that it receive prompt consideration.●

SENATE TAKES A STEP BACKWARD IN U.S. VISA POLICY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DRINAN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. DRINAN. Mr. Speaker, on July 26 major foreign policy steps were taken by the Senate regarding the arms embargo against Turkey and economic sanctions against Rhodesia. Both actions received prominent national attention. However, on the same day the Senate also took a major step in foreign policy which received little attention—it voted to rescind the McGovern amendment.

The McGovern amendment to the International Security Assistance Act was enacted last year symbolizing our good faith as a signatory to the Helsinki Final Act, which called for freer international movement of people and ideas. The provision, in its own words, was intended to achieve "greater U.S. compliance with the provisions of the final act" and to encourage "other signatories to comply with those provisions." The McGovern amendment accomplished this by removing from our immigration laws the presumption against the admission into the United States of a prospective visitor simply because of his or her affiliation with the Communist Party.

The McGovern amendment is more important as a symbol than for any actual change in the workings of our immigration laws. The immigration law contains 31 classes of people who are inadmissible to the United States. I commend section 212(a) of the law to the attention of my colleagues. These classes range from persons who "have had one or more attacks of insanity," and who are "paupers" or "mental defects," to those who are anarchists, who may be involved in espionage, sabotage, terrorism or who may in any way endanger the national security of the United States. No one would dispute our right and responsibility to exclude those persons who constitute a potential threat to our national security concerns.

The McGovern amendment did not change those provisions of the law. It simply said we are not afraid of ideas. The section of our immigration law which denies a visa to a person because of an affiliation with the Communist Party also contains authority for the Secretary of State to ask the Attorney General for a waiver. In 1975, 2 years before the McGovern amendment became law, 96 percent of those initially denied visas simply because of organizational affiliation, were granted waivers.

The McGovern amendment directed the Secretary of State to act automatically in such cases, making an immediate waiver recommendation to the Attorney General so that a visa could be issued, unless the Attorney General found a basis for exclusion beyond affiliation with the Communist Party. Thus what was in fact practice became law. Since its enactment the McGovern amendment has facilitated the admission of 40 persons, and the 40 were not solely from Warsaw Pact countries. They were from Australia, Italy, and Finland as well.

In a letter to Senator MCGOVERN, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance warned:

For the United States to repeal the McGovern Amendment at this point, when we are criticizing the Soviet Union and Eastern European countries for violations in the human rights field, would be to rob our efforts of force and credibility. Not only the Soviets, but also many of our friends in Eastern Europe would wonder about the sincerity of a government and Congress which urge progress on others while at the same time moving backwards in the administration of its own legislation. Public commitment to the goals of the Helsinki Final Act in the United States could also be weakened by this example of American disregard for the spirit of this undertaking.

One of the most eloquent defenders of the McGovern amendment during debate on it this week was Senator ROBERT DOLE of Kansas. A member of the Congressional Commission which monitors compliance with the terms of the Helsinki Act, Senator DOLE stated:

Having been to Belgrade on two occasions and having visited Ambassador Goldberg, and knowing how the Soviets have used this one item in their discussion of the Helsinki Final Act, it seems to me that if we restore the law to bar Soviet officials and Warsaw Pact officials from obtaining visas unless they get a waiver, we are discriminating against certain people, because of their political beliefs, which is a violation of the Helsinki Agreement, the so-called Basket I. It goes against the clause encouraging human contact, which is Basket II.

Early in the 95th Congress I introduced legislation to accomplish the same purpose as the McGovern amendment to the International Security Assistance Act. My bill, H.R. 6308, removed the automatic exclusion of members of the Communist Party from the Immigration and Naturalization Act directly. H.R. 6308 was cosponsored by 20 Members of Congress.

If the United States is to speak with authority on the issue of the denial of human rights abroad, we must act to remove from our own law an antiquated, unnecessary, and offensive automatic denial of entry visas simply on the basis of political affiliation. Is not our free society strong enough to permit visits by people who might either hold or espouse political ideas with which we disagree? Would we not be offended if a nation excluded all visitors who advocated the political ideas of parliamentary democracy, solely on those grounds?

Opponents of the McGovern amendment argued that its repeal would serve to protest the recent increase in Soviet oppression of minorities and dissidents. This short-sighted argument ignores two central facts: first, if we are to retain our credibility in criticizing such oppression, we must remove our own laws which violate the Helsinki accord; and second, this exclusion is not limited to visitors from the Soviet Union and Warsaw Pact nations, but denies entry to people from Western Europe, Latin America, and throughout the world.

During the Belgrade Conference to review compliance with the Helsinki Final Act, Arthur Goldberg, chief of the U.S. delegation, cited the McGovern amendment as an example of what the United States had done to carry out the terms of the Helsinki Final Act. Our allies in the North Atlantic Assembly, composed of parliamentarians from all the NATO nations, formally commended the United States for its long overdue action to repeal the automatic exclusion of people simply due to their political beliefs.

If we are to retain our ability to speak on behalf of the principle of free emigration and adherence to the terms of the Helsinki agreement, we must reverse the backward step taken by the Senate in striking the McGovern amendment. I trust that the House conferees on the International Security Assistance Act will insist that the McGovern amendment, and with it America's compliance with the Helsinki Final Act, be restored.●

THE 20TH OBSERVANCE OF CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FLOOD) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, the 20th observance of Captive Nations Week was a huge success. Here on Capitol Hill, in the major cities and even in foreign lands the observances was punctuated by religious events, parades, rallies, receptions, luncheons, and seminars—all in dedicated response to Public Law 86–90 and proclamations by the President, Governors, and mayors in States across the Nation. With mystical symbolism, the week highlighted the barbaric trials in the U.S.S.R. of Ginzburg, Scharansky, and Petkus.

I had the pleasure of addressing some 500 participants in the reception on July 18 in the Senate Caucus room. It was my great pleasure, too, to receive the Liberty Award from the National Captive Nations Committee on July 20. In a TV interview, Dr. Lev E. Dobriansky of Georgetown University and chairman of NCNC presented me with the award. As he put it—and I quote—

This is in popular recognition of over twenty years of dedication and service in behalf of freedom and the eventual liberation of all the captive nations in Central Europe, the USSR, Asia, and Cuba.

For selected examples of the 20th observance I append to my remarks the following: First, proclamations by Gov. James B. Hunt, Jr. of North Carolina and Mayor Dale G. Bennett of Hialeah, Fla., second, an article by Joseph McLellan, "The Launching of Captive Nations Week" in the July 19 Washington Post, third, the Captive Nations Week program on Capitol Hill, July 20, fourth, the America editorial of July 13, "Remember the Captive Nations," and fifth, the report in the China Post, July 15, "Dr. Ku Invited to U.S. Receptions":

PROCLAMATION

Whereas, the imperialistic politics of Russian Communists have led, through direct and indirect aggression, to the subjugation and enslavement of the peoples of Poland, Hungary, Lithuania, Ukraine, Czecho-Slovakia, Latvia, Estonia, Byelorussia, Romania, East Germany, Bulgaria, Mainland China, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, North Korea, Albania, Idel-Ural, Serbia, Croatia, Slovenia, Tibet, Cossackia, Turkestan, North Vietnam, Cuba, Cambodia, South Vietnam, Laos, and others; and

Whereas the desire for liberty and independence by the overwhelming majority of peoples in these conquered nations constitutes a powerful deterrent to any ambitions of Communist leaders to initiate a major war: and

Whereas, the freedom loving peoples of the captive nations look to the United States as the citadel of human freedom and human rights and to the people of the United States as the leaders in bringing about their freedom and independence; and

Whereas, the Congress of the United States by unanimous vote passed Public Law 86–90 establishing the third week in July each year as Captive Nations Week and inviting the people of the United States to observe such a week with appropriate prayer, ceremonies and activities; expressing their sympathy with and support for the just aspirations of the captive nations:

Now, therefore, I, James B. Hunt, Jr., Governor of the State of North Carolina, do hereby proclaim the week of July 16–22, 1978, as "Captive Nations Week in N.C." and commend this observance to our citizens.

PROCLAMATION

Whereas, the imperialistic politics of Russian Communists have led, through direct and indirect aggression, to the subjugation and enslavement of many peoples of this earth; and

Whereas, the desire for liberty and independence by the overwhelming majority of peoples in these conquered nations, as well as in Hialeah, constitutes a powerful deterrent to any ambitions of Communist leaders to indicate a major war; and

Whereas, the freedom loving peoples of the captive nations look to the United States as the citadel of human freedom; and

Whereas, the Congress of the United States by unanimous vote passed Public Law 86-90 establishing the third week in July each year as Captive Nations Week: and

Now, therefore, I, Dale G. Bennett, Mayor of the City of Hialeah, Florida, do hereby proclaim the week of July 16-22, 1978, as "Captive Nations Week" in Hialeah and call upon our citizens to join with others in observing this week.

[From the Washington Post, July 19, 1978]

THE LAUNCHING OF CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

(By Joseph McLellan)

The Russians can usually be relied on to do something nasty around this time of year and revive interest in Captive Nations Week—an occasion for rubbing SALT into the administrations wounds.

This year, they outdid themselves spectacularly with last week's dissident trials, and accordingly a reception to launch Captive Nations Week, sponsored jointly by Sens. Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D.-N.Y.) and S. I. Hayakawa (R-Calif.), packed the enormous Senate Caucus Room to capacity.

"For the first time in many years," said Moynihan, "the American people have been able to see the true face of Soviet tyranny, the genuine totalitarian brutality that that regime represents."

The applause was tumultuous from a crowd that included many senators and representatives and members of their staffs but also a strong representation of the clergy and people of Eastern European origin—assembled to insist, for the 20th year in a row, that the United States does not and should not forget the plight of those who live unwillingly under Communist governments.

Sen. Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.) confided that when an aide brought in this year's Captive Nations resolution for endorsement, the aide suggested that it might be "out of date—old hat," and that his reply was "not on your life—those who hold these nations captive count on the fact that we will be unable to run the course. So I beg you, dedicate yourselves to their struggle for freedom—not only during my lifetime and yours, but thereafter. It may take a long time, but justice will triumph if those who believe in justice persist."

The three bars distributed around the room were nearly deserted during the ceremonies, as people crowded to hear the oratory by such speakers as Sens. Strom Thurmond (R.-S.C.), Richard Schweiker (R-Pa.), Harrison Schmitt (R-N.M.), and Reps. Daniel Flood (D-Pa.), Eldon Rudd (R-Ariz.) and former Rep. Walter Judd of Minnesota. The motifs varied widely from Thurmond's brief, simple, "My heart is with you . . . I will do anything I can to help," to a visionary scheme by Rep. Steven D. Symms (Individualist R-Idaho): "If we could bombard the Russians with Sears, Roebuck catalogues, we'd go a long way toward solving our problems."

Among those in the audience were a good many people born in one or another of the captive nations. Electronic engineer Constantin Rauta, for example, who defected from Romania four years ago and now works at the Goddard Space Flight Center, is awaiting the day when his wife and son can overcome red tape and American apathy and his former government's obstacles and join him here.

One woman, who asked to have her name withheld, said that she has had relatives killed both by the Nazis and by the Communists, and she wondered what cocktail parties have to do with the plight of the captive nations.

"I come every year to some kind of party for the captive nations," she said. We have drinks and everybody talks, but I always have the feeling that they only come to get the ethnic vote, but they don't do a damned thing about it."

[From "America" (Philadelphia, Pa.), July 13, 1978]

REMEMBER THE CAPTIVE NATIONS

The week of July 16-22, 1978 will mark the 20th observance of Captive Nations Week. The Resolution which established the third week of July each year as "Captive Nation Week" in the United States, was passed by the U.S. Congress on July 17, 1959 and signed into Public Law 86-90 by President Eisenhower. The Resolution calls on each President of the United States to issue each year a proclamation of "Captive Nations Week" until such time as freedom and independence shall have been achieved for all the captive nations of the world . . ."

The Resolution was and continues to be a powerful and outstanding document of U.S. foreign policy, inasmuch as it clearly denotes the U.S. will not recognize Soviet Russian territorial and political conquests in Europe and Asia.

The Helsinki Accords by which 33 European governments, Canada and the United States recognized the "status quo", cannot supercede the "Captive Nations Week Resolution," because the latter is a law, while the Helsinki Accords is just an agreement entailing now legal consequences for the U.S. government.

Rightly, the Kremlin has been greatly concerned about the resolution, as was indicated by the Soviet press, commentaries and scathing attacks, which continued even today with uninterrupted denunciations and fury. According to Prof. Dobriansky, President of the UCCA and Chairman of the National Captive Nations Committee (NCNC), Georgi Arbatov, head of Moscow's "American Institute," lectured a U.S. exchange group last December on the necessity to liquidate the idea of the captive nations and the Week if detente is to continue. In March 1978, members of the House Armed Services Committee were confronted in Moscow by members of the Supreme Soviet, criticizing some Congressmen for their contribution to the volume. "The Bicentennial Salute to the Captive Nations", and openly crying "Do you want to break up our country?"

This deep concern of Moscow over the captive nations is understandable, because the very concept of the captive nations reminds the free people everywhere of the captivity of the millions of people held in thralldom by Russian Communism.

Yet, not all U.S. highly-placed officials understand this concern. In the past, some powerful figures in Washington tried to prevail upon one or another U.S. President not to issue the "Captive Nations Proclamation" for fear of upsetting the policy of detente!

Now with the Kremlin embarking on an imperialistic course in Africa, the problem of the captive nations in the USSR assumes even more important significance. The captive nations in the USSR are not only our true and proved allies, but they also constitute an inherent weakness of the Soviet Russian totalitarian empire.

As we are entering "Captive Nations Week," we ought to manifest our belief in the meaning of this event. Each and every one of us should participate in the events marking observance of the Week. Whether it is a religious manifestation, a rally, a march, or a lecture dealing with "Captive Nations Week"—we should wholly support these events and take active part in them. Moreover, we should see to it that the local American press, TV and radio stations are adequately informed about the captive nations—and in our case especially—about Ukraine. The UCCA has just published an informative brochure—"The Captive Nations: Responsibility of the Free World," containing factual data on the captive nations, which would provide the necessary information to the American media.

The American people have always been generous in their support of those fighting for freedom. On this 20th observance we must show the captive nations and their oppressors that Americans sympathize with their plight and will stand by them with whatever help they can give until the day of freedom and independence—the overall objective of struggle of all the captive nations has been achieved.

DR. KU INVITED TO U.S. RECEPTIONS

Dr. Ku Cheng-kang, honorary chairman of the World Anti-Communist League, yesterday sent cables to U.S. Senator S. I. Hayakawa, Senator Daniel P. Moynihan and U.S. Representatives Daniel J. Flood, and Edward

J. Derwinski, to thank them for their invitations to attend receptions to commemorate the 1978 Captive Nations Week in Washington on July 18 and July 20.

Dr. Ku, however, told the Senators and Representatives in his cables that he could not attend, since he has to preside over the 1978 Captive Nations Week activities in Taipei, to be held from July 16 to 22.●

REGULATORY FLEXIBILITY AND REFORM ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, today, along with my good friend and colleague from Wisconsin, Congressman BALDUS, I am introducing the Regulatory Flexibility and Reform Act.

This bill represents a refined version of an earlier bill which Congressman BALDUS and I introduced, H.R. 12296, with 26 cosponsors.

The basic purpose of the bill is to provide the agencies and departments of the Federal Government with the necessary tools to tailor regulations to the size and resources of those being regulated. The intended effect of the bill is to relieve small business, small organizations, small governmental jurisdictions and individuals of limited resources of some of the regulation and paperwork burden.

During the period of public comment on regulations, agencies would be required to solicit and consider regulatory alternatives which would be less costly but which would still meet the legislative goals of the regulations. An agency that rejected a lesser cost alternative would be required to explain why it did so in the final rule.

The bill proposes a number of approaches to flexible regulations: the use of "two-tier" or "multi-tier" standards for organizations and businesses of differing economic sizes; the use of performance-oriented standards rather than standards which impose particular technologies; and the use of progressively applied standards which condition exemption from more rigorous standards upon satisfactory compliance with less rigorous standards.

The bill also sets up stringent new restrictions governing the imposition of reporting and recordkeeping requirements on the public by Federal agencies. If regulations include reporting requirements from the public, they must so indicate at the time they are originally proposed. Regulations which would create significant paperwork for those affected would have to be proposed and opened to public comment—including suggestions for less burdensome approaches—just like substantive regulations.

Senators NELSON and CULVER have taken the lead on this legislation in the Senate. More than a third of the Senate is now cosponsoring the bill. Over 200 associations of small businesses and small nonprofit organizations have backed the measure.

This new revised version is a result of evaluating comments submitted by agencies and interested parties on the Senate bill, which is identical to H.R. 12296. The new bill encourages the agencies to seek alternative regulatory strategies not only from within the Government, but from the public as well. It streamlines the requirements for agency impact statements. It mandates agency consideration of regulatory effects on small cities and towns, as well as on small enterprises and on individuals.

It offers regulatory strategies which go beyond "tiering," but have the same effect: reducing the burden on those least least able to bear it. It imposes strict controls on paperwork requirements. And, it opens the regulatory process further to public participation.●

REAL PROPERTY TAX COMPENSATION ACT OF 1978

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. OTTINGER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleague from New York (Mr. LENT) in cosponsoring the Real Property Tax Compensation Act of 1978.

Our bill would provide relief for the taxpayers who live in communities which are financially burdened with a great number of tax-exempt properties owned by foreign representatives living in the United States.

With the United Nations located in New York City, the New York metropolitan area has become the principal place of residence for foreign embassies and delegates working for the United Nations, and for other international organizations.

Due to our country's role as host to foreign representatives and international organizations, bilateral and multilateral treaties to which the United States is a party have evolved which grant tax-exempt privileges. Such privileges to foreign governments are desirable and necessary; however, they should not be at the expense of the local taxpayers who must carry the burden of financing municipal and school district services for their tax-exempt neighbors.

This problem was brought to my attention by the city of New Rochelle, N.Y., which, due to its location in Westchester County—only 15 miles from New York City—contains 19 such tax-exempt foreign properties. The total assessed valuation of these lands is $860,350 which represents a rather significant portion of New Rochelle's total assessed valuation of $393,187,186.

If taxes were being levied on these properties, New Rochelle would receive an additional $34,274 to finance its essential services. The school district would receive $54,505; Westchester County, $17,758; and the sewer district would collect an added $3,687.

This legislation would allow for communities like New Rochelle to be reimbursed by the Secretary of the Treasury an equal amount of the real property tax revenue that the community would have received during the previous calendar year had these taxes been collected.

In these inflationary times, it is very difficult for local units of government, many of which are experiencing declining tax bases, to pay the costs of services rendered to tax-exempt representatives of foreign governments. The Federal Government has provided this tax-free privilege to foreign representatives and should assist communities in supporting services to these people.●

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. RODINO (at the request of Mr. WRIGHT), for today, on account of illness in the family.

Mr. VENTO (at the request of Mr. WRIGHT), for today, on account of official business.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. SIKES, for 30 minutes, on Monday, July 31, and Tuesday, August 1.

Mr. GOLDWATER, for 10 minutes, today.

SENATE—Friday, July 28, 1978

(Legislative day of Wednesday, May 17, 1978)

The Senate met at 9:45 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by Hon. PAUL G. HATFIELD, a Senator from the State of Montana.

Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD. The convening prayer will be offered by the Honorable RICHARD G. LUGAR, a Senator from the State of Indiana.

PRAYER

The Honorable RICHARD G. LUGAR, a Senator from the State of Indiana, offered the following prayer:

Dear God, help us to see our work in proper perspective. You are our Creator. You are our loving Father, now and for eternity.

We pray for the souls of four of our Members who began this session of the Congress with us and who dwell now with You. We know that we will serve not a day nor an hour longer than You wish.

But while we serve, help us to learn more about prayer and, through prayer, to learn more about You and Your world. If we should begin to succeed in not taking ourselves so seriously, teach us also how to succeed much more abundantly in taking our work much more seriously. There is so much to do. Help us to find sound alternatives, and help us to forward justice and mercy through timely decisions.

Be close to us on this day and guide us in making our rules and policies more humane. Remind us of the need to conserve the greatness of our natural heritage, to have compassion for the poor, to learn truly how to love one another as better vessels of Your will and with recognition that we are surrounded by Your awesome and Your loving presence. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND).

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., July 28, 1978.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3 of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable PAUL G. HATFIELD, a Senator from the State of Montana, to perform the duties of the Chair.

JAMES O. EASTLAND,

Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE LEADERSHIP

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the majority leader, the Senator from West Virginia, is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at such time as Mr. MORGAN is recognized under the order, he may utilize any of my time that he may need.

RECOGNITION OF LEADERSHIP

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the minority leader is recognized. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have no requirement for my time and no request for the time. I note that the majority leader yielded the remainder of his time to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina. If he needs more, I shall be glad to give him mine, too.

I inquire if he has any need for that.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, with all the generosity of the leaders this morning, I might expound on a number of subjects.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I think we might have encouraged the distinguished Senator excessively. I withdraw my offer.

I yield back my time.

SPECIAL ORDER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. MORGAN) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes plus the time yielded by the majority leader.

THE POSTAL SERVICE SITUATION

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have asked for time this morning to speak on a subject that is of great concern to the people of North Carolina and, I believe, to people all over the Nation. That is the Postal Service of the United States.

I am becoming increasingly concerned about the Postal Service, or lack of it, in North Carolina. I am sure that parallel situations can be found in other States.

People are paying the new, higher rates, such as the 15 cents it costs to mail a letter, because they have no choice. We in Congress have seen to that; we have given the Postal Service a monopoly on first class mail. The sharp increase is part of the inflation that has hit us all, and is also contributing to that same inflationary spiral.

I have also been told that the extremely slow delivery of mail is hurting the more than 100 nondaily newspapers that are published in North Carolina, the businessmen who advertise their products in those newspapers, and the thousands of subscribers.

Nondaily papers depend on the mails to get most of their copies to their subscribers.

And most of them publish on Wednesday or Thursday so that the papers can be delivered to readers before the weekend.

Businesses that advertise, for the most part, gear their advertising to attract people to their places before the weekend. A grocery, for instance, will advertise its special prices aimed at people doing their end-of-the-week shopping.

But I have been told by publishers that all too often, the papers that are mailed on Thursday do not get delivered until Monday of the next week. This, I am informed, is not an isolated case, but has become widespread.

This snail-like performance on the part of the Postal Service is critically injuring these newspapers and it is also harming the thousands of North Carolina businesses, large and small, who use them to advertise their wares.

This seems to me to be a ridiculous situation, and also a serious one.

The publisher of one of our better North Carolina nondaily newspapers told me about his problems. He publishes his paper in the largest town in his county, which contains several small towns that have separate post offices. He said:

> Our rates have gone up some 450 percent in the last few years and now we do most of the work for the post office. We place the mail that is to go to each other post office in a separate bag so that all they have to do at the post office is deliver the bags. But we found that we can't do that.
> If we sent the bags to the post office in our town on Thursday, the bags are sent to a distributing point a hundred miles away and they won't get back here before the weekend. So what we have to do is to put the bags in a car and take them to the other nearby post offices. That's the only way we can be assured of same week delivery.

Now I submit there is something wrong with a system that will send a mail bag full of newspapers a hundred miles to a distribution point rather than sending it 12 miles to the post office where it is supposed to eventually go.

As I say, this would be ridiculous and also comical if it were not seriously affecting several thousand businesses in our State.

This situation with nondaily newspapers is but a symptom of the whole sickness that has affected our ability to deliver the mail in this country.

Almost everyone has his own horror story of a letter or a package that took a week to move for just a short distance.

Just last week, it took 5 days for me to get a letter mailed from the Democratic National Committee in northwest Washington to my office here in this section.

A few years ago we listened to those who claimed that all the Post Office needed was to be taken away from the Government and placed under private control.

We have tried that and just how well it has worked in holding down costs and providing better service is apparent to everyone.

It may be time to seriously consider returning it to where it was and to see if we can get a weekly newspaper delivered 10 miles in the same week that it was published.

Mr. President, I would urge the members of the committee that handles the Post Office to give consideration to returning the Postal Service back where it belongs.

It is not a question of pay. The lowest paid Postal Service employee in most towns in North Carolina make more than the highest paid schoolteacher that is charged with the instruction of our children. Yet we cannot get a newspaper delivered within 10 miles.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I am delighted to.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. It is a most interesting presentation that the Senator from North Carolina has made to the Senate today.

It is really astonishing to learn, which I had not learned before, that mail has to be taken a hundred miles and then brought back to a distribution point within 12 miles of where it originally started before mail can be delivered.

It is no wonder, in such a circumstance as that, that the delivery of the mail is as bad as it is in many areas.

May I ask the Senator this, did he happen to see in the press last week, I believe it was, where an individual in Salt Lake City sent two letters to the same addressee in San Francisco, one went by regular mail, U.S. Postal Service, the other went by Pony Express. The Pony Express letter was received before the regular mail letter was received.

Mr. MORGAN. I would say to my colleague that I did not see it, but the fact does not surprise me at all.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, while I am on this subject, I notice in the press that postal workers across the Nation are talking about striking. It just happened to occur to me when I read one of those stories that whenever an employee of this Senate fills out his application to go on the payroll to work for this Senate, he has to certify that he has never participated in a strike against the U.S. Government. I think that is proper, because if the millworker down in my hometown wants to go on strike, I can go somewhere else and find some blue denim from his competitor.

But we in Government have given to the Postal Service a monopoly. We cannot turn anywhere else for service. We are dependent upon these people for service and I do not believe that it is right for public employees who are given this right to engage in strikes.

I might say that it is a violation of the law for a person to strike. In the Public Law 89–554, title V, it forbids any person from accepting or holding a job of the Federal Government, or in the District of Columbia government, who participates in a strike or asserts a right to strike against a Government employer.

Mr. President, I want to serve notice on the Attorney General, or whoever is in charge of enforcing the laws of this Nation, that I, for one, as a Member of this Senate, expect to see that law upheld.

We cannot continue to tolerate unlawful public employee strikes which damage the public good and endanger the national security of this country.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I am delighted to yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator from Virginia would like to associate himself with the views just expressed by the able Senator from North Carolina.

I think we do have adequate laws on the books. The problem is, is the Government willing to enforce the laws?

Now, when they get to ticklish and difficult situations, such as the public employee strikes, they want to take the easy way out and want to say, "Well, we don't want to ruffle the feathers of a powerful political group, so we'll not enforce the law."

I want to associate myself with the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. MORGAN) in expressing the hope that the Attorney General, the President, those in a position of responsibility, will see that the laws are enforced and that the interests of all the people of the country are protected against unauthorized and unlawful strikes against the Government.

Mr. MORGAN. I thank my colleague.

I hope they will not negotiate away these rights. I do not believe anybody has the authority to do so. But it seems to me that in almost every labor situation, about the last thing that is negotiated is that "Well, all right, we're going to settle this, provided all criminal charges are dropped."

The Congress of the United States put this law on the books, and I do not believe that the Postmaster General—I understand he is enforcing it, and I hope we will give him our moral backing—the President of the United States, the Attorney General or anyone else should negotiate away these rights.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I shall speak now of one of our departed colleagues, the late Jim Allen, of Alabama.

JAMES B. ALLEN: A MAN OF STATURE

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the death of Senator James Browning Allen is a loss to us all, regardless of our ideology or party affiliation.

I shall remember Senator Allen as a man of strong conviction in not only matters of substance, but equally strong in his conviction on the rules by which legislative decisions were made.

All of us knew Senator Jim Allen, the conservative, a man who fervently believed in the rights of our States to determine their own destiny, a man who believed in a strong national defense, and a man who promoted the concept of private enterprise over government initiative.

While I remember Jim Allen for his disciplined ideology, I will also remember him for his steadfast commitment to the notion of the Senate as a body of coequals. Indeed, Senator Allen's knowledge of the rules of the Senate made this a more democratic body.

Senator Allen provided a worthy model for us all. He was a deeply religious man who shared with us, particularly through example, his strongly held religious beliefs.

This great Alabamian and American was a student of all aspects of the legislative process. His effectiveness at every step in the legislative process is a standard that we should all strive to achieve.

We all will remember Jim Allen for different legislative accomplishments. I will especially recall Senator Allen as a friend of the farmers of this Nation. This past winter and spring, when the farmers came to Washington to protest low crop prices, Senator Allen was at the forefront in pushing for an improved farm program.

I recall his commitment to modernizing the farm credit programs. In my capacity as chairman of the Subcommittee on Rural Housing, I had the opportunity to cooperate with him on much of this legislation.

Indeed, it should not come as a surprise that his last bill to clear the Senate dealt with the subject of our farm system credit.

Jim Allen was a formidable force in the Senate. His influence went far beyond the reach of his seniority. It is a tribute to this great man that he exercised his abilities in a manner that contributed to greater service to his beliefs and constituency.

The Members of this Chamber extend their sympathy to his widow, MARYON, and the other members of his family.

Mr. President, we all will miss Senator James Browning Allen.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 5 minutes of his time?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield all my remaining time to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia is recognized.

PANAMA CALLS ON UNITED STATES TO QUIT CUBA BASE

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, a week ago today, the Richmond Times Dispatch, of Richmond, Va., published an Associated Press dispatch from Panama City, Panama. The headline reads: "Panama Calls On U.S. To Quit Cuba Base." I will read the first several paragraphs of this news article:

PANAMA.—Panama called yesterday for the United States to give up the Guantanamo Naval Base in Cuba, to allow self-determination for Puerto Rico, and for Israel to return all of occupied Arab lands.

The government made the points in a 14-page document intended to lay the basis for its foreign policy.

"The centerpiece of our foreign policy has been the canal. Now that an agreement has been reached with the United States, we felt we needed to redefine our foreign policy," Foreign Minister Nicolas Gonzalez Revilla said.

That is the end of the quotation from the Associated Press dispatch from Panama.

Mr. President, it did not take Panama very long to begin to flex its muscles after the United States gave to Panama property of the United States with a replacement value of approximately $9 billion.

According to the proponents, the purpose of giving away the Panama Canal was to appease the Panamanians, to try to bring about a more friendly relationship with the Panamanians. That action has been taken. The Senate has approved the giving away of the Panama Canal.

Within 2 months after that action having been taken, Panama now calls upon the United States to give up its naval base at Guantanamo.

Panama is not even content with that. Panama goes on to tell the United States what it should do about Puerto Rico.

But Panama is not even content with that. As a basic part of its foreign policy, according to the Foreign Minister, it is telling Israel what it should do in regard to occupied Arab lands.

Mr. President, one would think that Panama would be well satisfied to have been the recipient, at no cost to itself, of the Panama Canal and of property with a total replacement value of $9 billion.

But apparently Panama is not satisfied with that, and it now seeks to require the United States to give up its important naval base in Cuba.

I do not know what response Congress will make to that Panamanian demand. I can only say what response the Senator from Virginia will make. The Senator from Virginia is not receptive to any such demand in the part of Panama and, in fact, thinks it is none of Panama's business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

TIME-LIMITATION AGREEMENT—S. 2090

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at such time as Calendar No. 822, S. 2090, authorization for community services, is called up and made the pending business before the Senate, that there be a time limitation of 1 hour to be equally divided between Mr. NELSON and Mr. JAVITS, with 30 minutes on any amendment, and 15 minutes on any debatable motion, appeal or point of order which is submitted to the Senate, and that the agreement be in the usual form.

RECLAMATION SAFETY OF DAMS ACT OF 1978

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of S. 2820, which will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2820) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, restore, operate, maintain new or modified features at existing Federal reclamation dams for safety of dam purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources with an amendment on page 2, beginning with line 12, strike through and including line 22, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 4. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to pay and discharge that portion of the costs associated with the replacement of the American Falls Dam which the irrigation spaceholder contracting entities are obligated to pay pursuant to the implementation of the Act of December 28, 1973 (87 Stat. 904), to treat such costs as costs incurred under this Act, and to enter into contracts with the irrigation spaceholder contracting entities to accomplish the payment and discharge of such costs.

SEC. 5. All costs heretofore or hereafter incurred pursuant to this Act shall be nonreimbursable and nonreturnable under reclamation law.

SEC. 6. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary, but not to exceed $100,000,000, to carry out the provisions of this Act: Provided, That no funds shall be obligated for carrying out actual construction to modify an existing dam under authority of this Act prior to sixty days (which sixty days shall not include days on which either the House of Representatives or the Senate is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three calendar days to a date certain) from the date that the Secretary has transmitted a report on such existing dam to the Congress. The report required to be submitted by this section will consist of a finding by the Secretary of the Interior to the effect that modifications are required to be made to insure the safety of an existing dam. Such findings shall be accompanied by a technical report containing information on the need for structural modification, the corrective action deemed to be required, alternative solutions to structural modification that were considered, the estimated cost of needed modifications, and environmental impacts if any resulting from the implementation of the recommended plan of modification.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act shall be cited as the "Reclamation Safety of Dams Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. In order to preserve the structural safety of Bureau of Reclamation dams and related facilities the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to perform such modifications as he determines to be reasonably required. Said performance of work shall be in accordance with the Federal reclamation laws (Act of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 388, and Acts amendatory or supplementary thereto).

SEC. 3. Construction authorized by this Act shall be for the purposes of dam safety and not for the specific purposes of providing additional conservation storage capacity or of developing benefits over and above those provided by the original dams and reservoirs. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to reduce the amount of project costs allowed to reimbursable purposes heretofore authorized.

SEC. 4. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to pay and discharge that portion of the costs associated with the replacement of the American Falls Dam which the irrigation spaceholder contracting entities are obligated to pay pursuant to the implementation of the Act of December 28, 1973 (87 Stat. 904), to treat such costs as costs incurred under this Act, and to enter into contracts with the irrigation spaceholder contracting entities to accomplish the payment and discharge of such costs.

SEC. 5. All costs heretofore or hereafter incurred pursuant to this Act shall be nonreimbursable and nonreturnable under reclamation law.

SEC. 6. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary, but not to exceed $100,000,000, to carry out the provisions of this Act: Provided, That no funds shall be obligated for carrying out actual construction to modify an existing dam under authority of this Act prior to sixty days (which sixty days shall not include days on which either the House of Representatives or the Senate is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three calendar days to a date certain) from the date that the Secretary has transmitted a report on such existing dam to the Congress. The report required to be submitted by this section will consist of a finding by the Secretary of the Interior to the effect that modifications are required to be made to insure the safety of an existing dam. Such findings shall be accompanied by a technical report containing information on the need for structural modification, the corrective action deemed to be required, alternative solutions to structural modification that were considered, the estimated cost of needed modifications, and environmental impacts if any resulting from the implementation of the recommended plan of modification.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Time for debate on this bill is limited to 1 hour to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN), with 30 minutes on any amendment and with 15 minutes on any debatable motion, appeal, or point of order.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a time transfer on the side of the minority and that such time be handled by the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon (Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD).

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Rick Cocker, of my staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor during the consideration of the pending measure.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. JACKSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho (Mr. McCLURE).

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Kit Caples, of my staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor during all stages of this legislation.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. JACKSON. I yield.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Beverly Charles, of Senator JAVITS' staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor during debate and votes on this bill.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a similar request?

Mr. JACKSON. I yield.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask uanimous consent that Linda Dickman, of my staff, be accorded the same privilege.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JACKSON. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mary Goedde, of Senator HAYAKAWA's staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor during consideration of this bill.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JACKSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Barry Berkoff, of my staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment be agreed to and that the bill as thus amended be treated as original text for the purpose of further amendment.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, the purpose of the pending measure, S. 2820, is to provide permanent authority for the Secretary of the Interior to undertake actions deemed necessary to assure safety of dams and related facilities under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Reclamation, thereby permitting such necessary actions to be taken in a more timely manner.

In the past few years, major modification of dams for safety purposes have been authorized by Congress on a case-by-case basis, with each project considered in a separate authorizing bill.

The committee believes that it would be appropriate to provide the Secretary with permanent authority to undertake safety of dams modifications rather than having to come to Congress for each project.

Mr. President, that summarizes basically what we are endeavoring to do in connection with the pending measure, S. 2820.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JACKSON. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 2820, the Reclamation Safety of Dams Act of 1978.

The Federal Government has a continuing responsibility to insure the safety of dams under its jurisdiction. The legislation before the Senate today deals with those dams and facilities under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Reclamation; it provides the Secretary of the Interior with permanent authority to modify dams for safety purposes rather than having Congress deal with each facility on a case-by-case basis.

I believe that the bill reported by the Energy and Natural Resources Committee addresses the issue in a responsible manner, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement of Senator HANSEN of Wyoming be printed in the RECORD.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR HANSEN

I support S. 2820, safety of dams legislation. This needed authorization would allow the Secretary of the Interior through the Bureau of Reclamation to proceed in a timely fashion with work to preserve the structural safety of dams under the jurisdiction of the Bureau.

A number of dams have been preliminarily identified as being in need of repairs and modification for safety reasons. It is imperative that funding be authorized for this work immediately. Concerns for life, property and safety of our people have to be first priority in our minds and actions. The reduced water level and secondary hardships on recreation and stream flows are of concern also. I would urge my colleagues to assist us in the prompt passage of this bill.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1528

(Purpose: Technical amendment to provide for conformance by S. 2820 with the Congressional Budget Act of 1974)

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk two technical amendments and ask for their immediate consideration.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) proposes two technical committee amendments, unprinted amendment numbered 1528.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the two technical amendments be dispensed with.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 3, line 5, insert the following: "to the extent and in the amounts provided in appropriations acts" after the word "contracts".

On page 3, line 11, insert the following: "effective October 1, 1978" after the word "appropriated".

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the two technical amendments be considered en bloc.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, the purpose of these two technical amendments is to bring the text of S. 2820 in compliance with the requirements of the Budget Control Act and as such the amendments do not have any substantive impact on the intent of the legislation.

Mr. President, I yield back my time.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I yield back the time on our side.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment en bloc.

The amendment was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1529

(Purpose: To authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make necessary repairs on the Scoggins Valley Road around Henry Hagg Lake, Oregon)

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk will read as follows:

The Senator from Oregon (Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1529.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place, add a new section as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed, notwithstanding the terms of the contract number 14–06–100–7174, to make necessary repairs on the Scoggins Valley Road around Henry Hagg Lake, Oregon, at Federal expense pursuant to the authority of P.L. 89–596 which authorized the construction operation and maintenance of the Tualatin Reclamation Project in Oregon.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, it is not because I believe the Bureau of Reclamation needs any further authority that I call up my amendment today. It is because the Department of the Interior will continue to resist solving a serious problem at the Tualatin project, now nearing completion in Oregon, unless Congress directs them to solve it immediately.

The problem concerns the perimeter road at Henry Hagg Lake, the reservoir behind the project's Scoggins Dam. Last winter it suffered severe damage from landslides in several locations. Repairs of the damaged sections are estimated by the Bureau to cost $1,375,000. In some locations the land fell away from beneath the roadbed, literally sending the entire section of asphalt down the hill.

This road is actually the county's, relocated by the Bureau to make way for the project; and although it is not on project—Federal—lands, it does provide access to all recreational features of the very popular Hagg Lake—the closest impoundment to metropolitan Portland. The Bureau's contract with the county provided that the Bureau would construct the road and turn it over to the county for operation and maintenance. It also provided for the Federal Government to pay for all extraordinary maintenance for a 2-year "warranty" period, which happened to coincide with the two abnormally dry winters my colleagues will recall as the great western drought of 1975 to 1977. In the following winter, in December of 1977 and after the warranty had expired, the normal prolonged wet weather activated six slides affecting the roadway, four of them major.

Obviously, the warranty period did not provide a good test of the road's construction.

I should point out, Mr. President, that at a recent hearing of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Public Works, the Commissioner of Reclamation indicated that the facts which I have stated are accurate. In response to a question from subcommittee Chairman JOHNSTON, Commissioner Higginson said:

Circumstances which could not be foreseen, when the above agreement was entered into between the two parties, were the extreme drought conditions that were to occur during the 2-year warranty period. It is highly probable that the slides would have occurred during the warranty period if normal weather conditions had prevailed. This probability is further substantiated by the fact that, during the first heavy rainfall season after the drought, slide areas developed in the relocated road.

It is our feeling that Washington County, through no fault of its own, did not receive full value from the warranty provision of the contract.

The purpose of my amendment is to assure that the Bureau corrects the road conditions which it ought to correct.

Mr. President, this matter has been cleared with the majority. It is a technical matter which is merely authorizing action for the Bureau to correct this particular problem that has been resisted by the Bureau up to this time.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, as I understand it, this amendment basically is an amendment to clarify existing authority on the part of the Commissioner. Mr. President, I join in supporting the amendment and yield back the time on our side.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1530

(Purpose: To authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make visitor protection modifications at Buffalo Bill Dam)

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I send to the desk one other amendment on behalf of Senator HANSEN and Senator WALLOP of Wyoming.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oregon (Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1530 on behalf of Mr. WALLOP and Mr. HANSEN.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 4, after line 6, insert the following:

SEC. 7. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to perform such modifications as he determines to be reasonably required to provide safe public access to the existing public viewing areas of the Buffalo Bill Dam. Such modifications may be made from funds appropriated under section 6 of this Act.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the statement of Senator WALLOP be printed in the RECORD.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR WALLOP

On May 17th the Bureau of Reclamation locked the gate on the public viewing area of Buffalo Bill Dam, a national historic civil engineering landmark located on the gateway to Yellowstone National Park. When completed in 1910, it was the highest concrete arch dam in the world. Last year this landmark attracted an estimated 300,000 visitors.

The Bureau barred public access, because the rockfall from the adjacent cliffs combined with the increased number of exposed visitors was creating a hazardous situation which they could no longer ignore.

This closing presents us with several options. We can allow the dam to remain closed to the public. It would be a national historic civil engineering landmark, to be viewed only in books and foggy memories.

We could demand that the Bureau re-open the area regardless of the risk to the life and limbs of visitors from all the states and abroad.

Or, the Bureau could make reasonable modifications to provide safe public access from the parking lot to the existing public viewing area of the dam. However, the Bureau does not have general authority to make nonreimbursable expenditures for public safety.

It may be that the Bureau should be given some general authority to accomplish these tasks when necessary. But this is a complex question which deserves more deliberate consideration, and meanwhile this scenic and historic area remains closed.

The amendment which we offer to S. 2820 will simply authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make nonreimbursable modifications adjacent to the Buffalo Bill Dam which are reasonably necessary to protect the visiting public from rockfall on the existing accessway to the viewing area of the dam.

The Buffalo Bill Dam is located only 5 miles west of Cody, Wyoming in a scenic and narrow gorge on the main eastern access road to Yellowstone National Park. The awesome view of this dam and its setting, combined with its proximity to such a busy artery, attracts an increasing number of visitors. It affords the only opportunity for some to view a high concrete arch dam.

Until this year, visitors followed a maintenance road from the parking lot through an abandoned unlined highway tunnel to view the dam and the canyon below. Falling rock has been a problem at the dam since its completion because of the steepness of the canyon walls and continuing fracturing of the rocks. There is no evidence that the extent of rockfall has increased over the years, but the greater visitation has increased the risk. In recent years the Bureau has closed the area to the public during the spring freeze and thaw periods when slides are most likely to occur. Now it remains closed during this busy summer season when thousands would normally step on their way to and from the parks.

The Bureau has examined the alternatives available and decided that the best solution is to enclose the walkway in a pre-cast concrete section. This would be a permanent solution to the problem, and would be compatible with possible future modifications at the dam.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. The purpose of this amendment is to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make modifications adjacent to the Buffalo Bill Dam in Wyoming to protect the public from rock fall on the existing accessway to the visiting area of the dam.

I believe it has been cleared with the floor manager and I urge its adoption.

I yield back the remainder of my time on this amendment.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of the time on our side.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. All time having been yielded back the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1531

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment on behalf of myself, the distinguished Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON), the Senators from Oregon (Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD and Mr. PACKWOOD), and the Senators from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH and Mr. MCCLURE), and the Senators from Montana (Mr. MELCHER and Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD).

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON), for himself and Mr. CHURCH, Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. PACKWOOD, and Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1531:

On page 4, line 6, insert the following new section:

"SEC. 7. The proviso contained in section 201 of the Colorado River Basin Project Act (43 U.S.C. 1511) is amended by striking out "ten years" and inserting in lieu thereof 'twenty years'."

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment on behalf of myself, the senior Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON), the Senators from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD and Mr. PACKWOOD), the Senators from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH and Mr. MCCLURE), and the Senators from Montana (Mr. MELCHER and Mr. HATFIELD).

Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to extend the interbasin water transfer study moratorium contained in the Colorado Basin Project Act for an additional 10 years.

As my colleagues in the Senate are well aware, the existing moratorium was included in the Colorado Basin Project Act to provide the time needed by the States in the Pacific Northwest to develop sound projections of water needs so that future demands from outside the Pacific Northwest could be examined in light of State and regional requirements. At the time this measure was initially enacted, there was a strong interest in the arid Southwest in importing supposedly "surplus" Columbia River water as a means of expanding agricultural development of arid lands and resolving interstate controversies over the division of Colorado River water. The Pacific Northwest, at that time, had not been faced with critical water conflicts and had not collected the basic information necessary to refute the contentions that the region could spare massive quantities of water.

The moratorium on interbasin transfer studies has proven to be a wise policy both for the Pacific Northwest and for the Nation. Since 1968, a new comprehension of the problems of resource management has come about. Water resources no longer are viewed as an expendable commodity to be consumed by the highest bidder until the streambed is dry.

Greater sophistication about the many uses of water resources has led to public appreciation of the problems of water quality maintenance, the fish and wildlife and recreational uses of flowing streams and the general ecological impacts of major changes in naturally occurring water.

The value of renewable hydroelectric power production at existing dams has been vastly enhanced by the energy crisis since 1968, and can no longer be dismissed as incidental.

The result of all these developments is to make major water transfers out of the Columbia River unthinkable by today's standards. The Pacific Northwest, indeed, is struggling with internal conflicts over the future development of its remaining water. Controversies between economic uses of water and environmental values have required painful deliberation. Decisions have been made to sacrifice worthwhile and justified hydroelectric projects in order to protect equally significant fisheries and nationally significant recreational and esthetic values.

In short, it is now conclusively proven—both by statistics and by current events—that there is no surplus water in the Pacific Northwest.

Nevertheless, we still hear of resolutions by public bodies, public statements of officials, and continued discussion in the Southwest which contemplate "augmentation" of the Colorado River at our expense.

Mr. President, there is no justification for Federal agencies to lend their credibility and the public's funds to these unrealistic "pipe dreams". We should not embark upon planning which would envision a single public works project which would cost billions of dollars, would benefit only a few citizens, and would jeopardize the future of two major regions in ways we could never predict.

The amendment which I propose will extend the existing moratorium on Federal studies of major interbasin water transfers for 10 more years. It will provide a clear policy statement that the Federal Government does not intend to encourage or support any such venture.

More importantly, it will be a clear signal to the people of both regions that they must make realistic plans to meet regional needs and create a regional future by the wise use of regional resources.

Mr. President, I urge the Senate to adopt this amendment.

I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with the chairman of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources as a cosponsor of this amendment.

Congress wisely prohibited such a study of interbasin water transfers in 1968 as a part of the Colorado River Basin Project Act and the facts today indicate strongly that a 10-year extension is warranted.

There are those who believe that the Pacific Northwest consists of a vast rain forest, that we are without water quantity problems. I wish this were so, Mr. President, but it is far from the truth. Just as water is not equally distributed throughout the Nation, it is not equally distributed in the Northwest or in my State. Average annual rainfall in some areas of Oregon is as little as 10 inches, and there is an incredible range in the amount of rainfall from year to year. Last year's drought, which was severe enough to bring congressional relief action, provided a vivid example of the problems we face. And it was not too long ago that the Department of the Interior stated that there were 183 communities in Oregon which faced water quantiy problems, caused by inadequate storage and distribution, and insufficient water supplies.

The fact is, Mr. President, that the Columbia River is already an extremely heavily used resource. When available, we are happy to share the benefits of that resource, which include surplus power provided to the Southwest during the summer months, and food grown on irrigated lands. But we cannot afford to think about shipping water itself out of our region when we have not completed our own resource planning and development.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers issued a report 2 years ago on irrrigation depletions in the Columbia River System. Their study concluded:

Due to seasonal and geographic distribution of runoff of the Columbia River System there is not sufficient water available with the present level of development to meet all existing and future river uses.

It seems absolutely clear that instead of devoting time and money to any study of diverting water out of our system, we need to deal with the conflicts which exist within it—conflicts which are already taxing the full potential of the Columbia River System.

So I am fully supportive of the amendment which is before the Senate. I urge my colleagues to adopt it.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I yield to my distinguished senior colleague from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON).

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I commend my colleagues from the Pacific Northwest for their compelling emphasis on the need to conserve waters from the Pacific Northwest rivers.

Senator JACKSON is right when he says:

There is no surplus water in the Pacific Northwest.

The amendment we are offering today is the same as legislation passed 10 years ago. The concept is the same. The goal is the same. Only the need has changed. It is greater.

The concept of the amendment is straightforward. It extends the interbasin water transfer study moratorium for an additional 10 years.

The goal of the amendment is equally straightforward. It is to discourage other regions from looking to the Pacific Northwest for water.

The need for this amendment is greater now than it was 10 years ago. For example, regional demand for water was sharply affected by the fuel crisis of 1973, the Northwest drought of 1977, and an increasing demand for irrigated land.

We are now in the process of planning for our future in relation to water, hydroelectric projects, and the potential of the Columbia Basin.

It would be difficult to come to a sensible solution if there is a constant threat hanging over the area as to the full potential of our water.

I repeat. If the need was there 10 years ago, it is doubly so now. We do not have a surplus of water. We have to conserve it wisely and carefully. This amendment allows the Pacific Northwest to respond to its needs.

I again want to compliment my colleague who has taken the leadership in this matter. I commend the Senators from Oregon, Idaho, and other States, who have joined with us in what I think is so necessary.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I thank my senior colleague for his kind comments. As a longtime member of the Appropriations Committee, and as its chairman, he has played a critical role in helping to make funds available for all of our great water development projects, not just in the Pacific Northwest but the Pacific Southwest as well.

I yield briefly for a unanimous consent request to the Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS).

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Harold Espy, of my staff, be permitted to have access to the floor today.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JACKSON. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), who has taken a tremendous interest in this project.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank my colleague the able chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee.

There is a provision in this bill, Mr. President, that relates to the American Falls dam in Idaho, which has recently been replaced due to structural faults.

AMERICAN FALLS SAFETY REPAIR

In 1973 Congress passed and the President signed into law a proposal to permit replacement and rehabilitation of the American Falls dam in Idaho through the use of non-Federal financing by the American Falls Reservoir District.

This action was necessitated by safety considerations caused by an alkali-aggregate reaction resulting in deterioration of the concrete in the dam. The economy of southern Idaho depended upon affirmative action to reconstruct and rehabilitate the dam. Nearly 900,000 acres of prime agricultural land depended to a large extent on the waters stored behind this dam.

When safety concerns led to restrictions on the storage capacity of this reservior in 1972, speedy action to repair the facility was vital. At that time, the Federal Government did not recognize an obligation to repair such facilities. This circumstance lead to a unique arrangement approved by Congress to allow the local irrigation district to assume the repair costs in conjunction with a private utility which installed hydroelectric generating facilities simultaneously with the dam repair project.

Mr. President, the 1973 congressional action to authorize this replacement endeavor has resulted in the completion of the repair project, at an expense to the irrigators of about $18 million and a cost of about $20 million to the utility. It is more than ironic that, even as the replacement dam at American Falls reaches completion, the Federal Government is now about to accept the responsibility for repair work in cases like the American Falls Dam.

We are prepared now to provide permanent authority to the Secretary of the Interior to undertake such repair actions related to safety of dams. Simple equity dictates that we should treat the American Falls irrigators in the same manner that this bill would treat irrigators on other reclamation projects. That is why I urged the committee to amend this bill to add the American Falls Dam to the list of 13 dams identified as needing safety repairs. Assumption of the American Falls irrigator's costs does not set a precedent. On at least four previous occasions, Congress has approved the expenditure of general tax funds for upgrading individual dams having structural faults.

Mr. President, I ask my colleagues to join with me in supporting this amendment bill to provide fair treatment for the American Falls irrigators.

THE CONTINUING THREAT OF WATER DIVERSION

Mr. President, I am joining with my colleagues from the Pacific Northwest in urging that the Senate pass the amendment offered by Senator JACKSON to extend the present water transfer study moratorium for another 10 years.

Proposals have been made frequently over the years to divert water from Pacific Nothwest rivers to other parts of the country, especially to the arid Southwest. By one count, there have been 17 such proposals advanced over the years, and 11 would have either utilized waters flowing into or out of Idaho, or would have had conveyance facilities installed within Idaho.

Congress enacted the present moratorium in 1968 after the House of Representatives had passed legislation which would have authorized diversion studies. If the present moratorium expires this year, we can expect States in the Colorado River Basin to renew longstanding pressures for water transfer studies. The call for diversion of water will become all the more fervent as the Colorado Basin States increase efforts to develop their rich coal and oil shale deposits, for such development is largely dependent upon adequate supplies of water.

To those who argue that the Southwest has abandoned plans for water diversion schemes, I would call the attention of my colleagues to a resolution passed late last year by the Los Angeles, Calif., Board of Supervisors.

The resolution, passed December 13, 1977, and sent to Members of Congress, urges that the Department of the Interior and the Army Corps of Engineers develop programs for a massive diversion of water from either the Columbia River or from the Snake River near Hagerman, Idaho.

The resolution suggests not only that water from Idaho and the Northwest be used in California, but also in Arizona, Nevada, and Mexico.

The resolution states:

> The entire Southwest United States could be turned into a bread basket to feed America and the world, and Columbia River water would eliminate drought conditions for the next 100 years and would create thousands of jobs.

If the present moratorium expires, we can expect more such resolutions, and added pressure, from the Colorado River Basin States to move ahead with diversion studies, no matter what the cost, and no matter what dislocations such plans would cause to the Pacific Northwest.

The resolution mentioned the alleviation of drought conditions in the Southwest. But last year's drought provided graphic evidence that Idaho and the Northwest do not have water to spare.

The State of Idaho, in developing a comprehensive plan for the future use and conservation of water resources within Idaho, came to the principal conclusion that the waters originating in Idaho, or passing through the State, will be effectively appropriated. As former Governor and now Secretary of the Interior Cecil Andrus observed in comments before the 1975 Idaho Water Conference:

> We in Idaho have been blessed with an abundant supply of one of our most precious resources: water . . . (W)e are still thinking that the question was how much surplus did we have, not how could we stretch our supplies to meet our needs.
> "However, as we began to complete the studies and gather information necessary to complete a water plan, it became evident that our problem was one of choices among potential uses of a scarce resource. When this situation became evident, careful consideration and planning of our alternative future courses of action became very important.

Because of the planning Idaho has done toward future need for water resources, Idahoans have long since given up the illusion that a surplus exists within our State. Idahoans are now more concerned with questions about how diminishing supplies can be divided among competing interests.

I would hope that the Southwest will ultimately abandon its own illusions about diverting water from the Northwest to the States of the Colorado River Basin. But until that happens, the Northwest must insist upon legal safeguards to protect our own interests. That is the reason why extension of the moratorium is essential, and that is why I urge the Senate to adopt this amendment.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I yield now to the distinguished junior Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE).

Mr. MCCLURE. Mr. President, I thank the chairman for yielding. I will very briefly comment concerning the pending amendment and the necessity for it.

Having served in the State legislature at a much earlier period, when the demands for water were not as well known in my State of Idaho and throughout the Northwest, we initiated a constitutional amendment for the creation of a water board in the State of Idaho, to make a study to determine the need for our water.

That amendment was submitted by the legislature to a vote of the people of Idaho, and they voted favorably upon it, because it was our feeling that the best protection we had for our water was to prove the need for it in our own area.

The water resources agency created as a result of that constitutional amendment has completed a water plan for Idaho, and they have clearly identified the fact that we are not a water surplus

State, at least in the regions of the State that are most closely located to the Colorado Basin. The Snake River Plains area, where the majority of the people of Idaho live, has demands upon that river for more water than normally flows in it, as we found from bitter experience last year. We cannot even store enough in storage for cycles of years that are less wet than normal.

The result has been that we are in a better position now than we were 10 years ago to prove the need for water within the State of Idaho. But the threat continues, and for those who think it does not, I can refer them only to a letter written by the Los Angeles Board of County Supervisors, in which they were again suggesting that the problems that they confront can be solved by creating a problem in the Northwest. They did not say it that way; that is my choice of words, not theirs. But the needs persist, and I commend the Senator from Washington for his leadership in bringing this matter to the floor at this particular time, remembering that the moratorium legislation of 10 years ago was the brainchild of my predecessor in the Senate, former Senator Len Jordan.

I think all of us in the Northwest join in this very justifiable concern, and again I appreciate the leadership of Senator JACKSON in bringing this measure to this point today.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield me 2 minutes for a question, so that I may ask for a clarification from my standpoint?

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold for just a moment, on final passage of the bill—not on the amendment—we ask for the yeas and nays.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JACKSON. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. I would just ask the Senator from Washington this question: About 2 years ago, Congress passed, as part of the public works omnibus bill, a provision for a study to be conducted jointly by the Economic Development Administration and the Department of Commerce, with reference to the high plains States and the Ogalalla Basin. Those States are Nebraska, Colorado, Wyoming, New Mexico, and Kansas.

Those States presently being irrigated by the Ogalalla Basin are depleting their reservoirs, and that study required those two Departments, together with the Governors of the States, to undertake reconnaissance studies of the possibility of importation of water into it from elsewhere.

I just want to make it clear, and see if the Senator agrees with me, that this dual extension of the previous prohibition in no way affects that ongoing study by those two Federal agencies and the Governors.

Mr. JACKSON. The Senator's understanding is correct. This moratorium is on studies of major importations of water into the Colorado River Basin. It would not affect work dealing with the Rio Grande drainage in any way.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JACKSON. I now yield to the Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER).

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman for yielding to me. I am pleased to join with him and the other Senators in the Northwest in sponsorship of this amendment.

I believe our State of Montana is one of the very important watershed areas for much of the country. The water uses that we have are principally for agriculture, power generation, recreation, including the retention of habitats for fish, municipal, and industrial.

Water has been our past, it is our present, and it will be our future opportunity for a beneficial and productive environment in our State of Montana. We need the protection of this amendment to safeguard this great natural asset that now benefits our State and will benefit it even more in the future.

Transferring water out of Montana from the Missouri Basin or the Columbia Basin would be robbing us of our heritage and cheating the coming generations of Montanans and our neighboring States.

Much of the West lacks the abundant average annual rainfall that the East, South, and Midwest receives. Our arid country depends upon the water flowing in our streams and rivers originating high in the mountains and kept flowing by melting snow that tides us through the dry days of summer.

This water is our lifeblood.

The amendment is needed to protect that lifeblood for our States. I urge its adoption.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I believe there are no other speakers on this particular amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. I have an amendment, but we have not disposed of this one yet.

Mr. JACKSON. No. Mr. President, I know of no one else who wishes to speak on this amendment. At this time I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. All remaining time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Yes.

Mr. McCLURE. I ask unanimous consent that Eddie Twilley of Senator THURMOND'S staff be granted the privileges of the floor during the consideration of this legislation.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1532

(Purpose: Authorize continuing expenditures on Indian Drought Relief Projects)

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment in behalf of myself and Senator CRANSTON and ask for its immediate consideration.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI), for himself and Mr. CRANSTON, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1532.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with further reading of the amendment.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 4, line 6, insert the following:

"SEC. 7. Public Law 95-226 is amended by adding at the conclusion of the first section the following sentence: 'There is authorized to be appropriated such funds as may be necessary, but under no circumstances, more than $1.5 million, to complete the following projects initiated under the Emergency Drought Act of 1977: Acoma Pueblo Project, Isleta Pueblo Project, San Ildefonso Pueblo Project, San Juan Pueblo Project, Taos Pueblo Project, Tesuque Pueblo Project, Zia Pueblo Project, Pala Mission Project, Rincon Mission Project, Morongo Mission Project, LaJoya Project, Pauma Project, San Carlos Apache Project, Gila River Project, Pyramid Lake Project, Summit Lake Project and Yerington Paiute Project.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I have called up my amendment No. 2792, having to do with Indian projects under the Emergency Drought Relief Act and ask for its immediate consideration. I am pleased to have as a cosponsor of this amendment, the gentleman from California (Mr. CRANSTON).

I would first like to submit to the desk a revision to my original amendment, a revision which requests a sum of $1.5 million to be appropriated for completion of certain specified projects. This differs from my original amendment in that I have now requested a specific dollar amount and have included a list of tribes that are in need of this funding.

I am offering this amendment to correct and clarify legislation that was passed earlier in this Congress; legislation that extended the deadline for completion of several Indian projects being funded under the Bureau of Reclamation's emergency drought relief program.

Perhaps it would be in order for me to explain the circumstances that surround this program, which will more clearly reveal the need for my amendment.

The worst recorded drought in most areas of the Western United States occurred in 1976–77. The Congress arising to the call for assistance, provided for the establishment of drought relief programs within several different agencies.

Specifically, the Emergency Drought Act of 1977 (Public Law 95–18) authorized to be appropriated $100 million for the Secretary of the Interior, through the Bureaus of Reclamation and Indian Affairs to make loans and grants to assist impacted areas. The act also authorized use of funds available under the Emergency Fund Act of 1948 and $30 million additional funding was included in the Supplemental Appropriations Act of 1977.

The program was to serve manifold needs. The funds were to be used, as stated in an April 1978 report of the Bureau:

. . . To establish a water bank to facilitate the transfer of water, to augment limited 1977 water supplies by providing loans to water user organizations, Indians and individual irrigators to develop wells, install pumps, build pipelines, and undertake other activities to alleviate the impact of the drought; to provide grants to State water resource agencies for drought emergency problems; to provide grants to fish and wildlife agencies to purchase or acquire additional water to mitigate damages to fish and wildlife resources caused by the drought; and to conduct studies to identify opportunities to augment or conserve water supplies and evaluate potential facilities to mitigate the effects of future drought.

There funds were awarded with the stipulation that all projects were to be completed by January 31, 1978.

Last winter, it became apparent that several Indian tribes were behind in meeting construction deadlines, due to a variety of reasons, from inclement weather to inability to secure equipment.

Consequently, H.R. 10532, legislation to extend the deadline for certain projects at the discretion of the Secretary was passed. I might add at this point that this legislation came out just prior to the deadline, and examination of the progress of the program to determine other needs was not implemented.

Therefore, H.R. 10532 did not provide for another problem that was surfacing at that time; that is the problem of expiring authorization for funding. Unbelievably, H.R. 10532 had simply extended the deadline for the program and not the funding. To have missed this major problem is clearly the fault of Congress, and with my amendment, I hope to correct this oversight in order that these projects may be completed.

As I stated when I introduced my amendment, this amendment does not have anything to do with the issue of dam safety. however, I see this bill as the only vehicle presently pending floor action that will correct the problem.

My amendment quite simply adds another section to Public Law 95–226 which extends the authorization for appropriated funds under the program for those projects that were designated by the Secretary to continue beyond the January 31, 1978 deadline.

From calculations that the BIA has made, it appears that about $1.5 million in additional funds are necessary to complete the work. Just recently the Bureau of Reclamation returned to the Congress, along with its final report, something in excess of $45 million that had not been obligated under the Emergency Drought Act of 1977. Therefore, when we are requesting about $1.5 million, we are not talking about a great deal of money, and yet, it is money that is vitally important to these tribes.

Mr. President, I believe that this is a very important matter that deserves congressional correction, and I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

Mr. President, I have discussed this amendment with the floor managers of the bill. This is a nongermane amendment. It authorizes $1.5 million specifically, not open-ended, for a number of itemized Indian projects that were caught half completed or at various stages of completion when we cut off last year's drought relief bill. These projects are enumerated with specificity and are found in four States: The States of California, Nevada, Arizona, and New Mexico.

We would like an opportunity to go to conference with these and if we can hold them to bring them back and see if we can convince the Senate Appropriations Committee that it is wiser to complete these projects than to leave them at various stages of completion such as wells half drilled, equipment unpurchased with a well drilled, or with no equipment to pump the water. Those are the kinds of facts which permeate those projects.

As I indicated, we are not seeking to reopen that fund. I think we did a superb job nationally in returning some $45 million to the Treasury by cutting off drought relief at a point certain. But I think in this case we are being very foolish to leave uncompleted, half purchased kinds of projects lingering, in the various pueblos and on the Indian reservations.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I would like to join the Senator in support of his amendment. I believe he makes an excellent point concerning some very important projects which should be given the highest priority. This is an appropriate way to handle it. I join in support of his amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Senator from Oregon.

I say to the distinguished floor manager (Mr. JACKSON), I would not bring this amendment to this bill if I had any other vehicle to resolve this inequity this year, but I could find no other vehicle.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I want to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Oregon (Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD) in support of the efforts of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. All time having been yielded back the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1533

(Purpose: Relative to the Teton Dam Disaster)

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE), for himself and Mr. CHURCH, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1533.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with further reading of the amendment.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

SEC. 7. The Act entitled "An Act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make compensattion for damages arising out of the failure of the Teton Dam a feature of the Teton Basin Federal reclamation project in Idaho, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1976 (Public Law 94–400) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 13. (a) Any funds authorized to be appropriated by section 12 of this Act, which are determined under subsection (b) to be excess funds, shall be made available by the Secretary for the purpose of carrying out projects under the Adjustment Program for the Teton Disaster Area (including related administrative costs), and such funds shall remain available until expended.

"(b) For purposes of this section, the term 'excess funds' means those funds authorized to be appropriated under section 12, and appropriated under the Act approved July 12, 1976 (Public Law 94–355) or the Act approved September 30, 1976 (Public Law 94–438), in excess of the total of—

"(1) the amount expended under this Act (including related administrative costs) prior to September 30, 1978 (or the date of the enactment of this section, if later),

"(2) the amount of outstanding claims timely filed under this Act which have not been paid as of September 30, 1978 (or the date of the enactment of this section, if later), and

"(3) the amount of the future administrative costs (as estimated by the Secretary) which will be incurred in carrying out the provisions of this Act (without regard to this section) after September 30, 1978 (or the date of the enactment of this section, if later), but the amount of excess funds as so determined shall not exceed the amount of funds required to complete the projects under the Adjustment Program for the Teton Disaster Area (including related administrative costs).

"(c) For purposes of this section, the term 'projects under the Adjustment Program for the Teton Disaster Area' means only the Federal share of those projects described in the study funded by the Economic Development Agency and specified in the document entitled 'Adjustment Program for the Teton Disaster Area, Summary of Remaining Economic Adjustment Measures,' May 1978, which have not been otherwise funded prior to September 30, 1978 (or the date of the enactment of this section, if later).

"(d) If the amount of excess funds as determined under this section is less than the amount required to complete the projects under the Adjustment Program for the Teton Disaster Area, the Secretary shall distribute such funds among such projects in such manner as he determines, after consultation with any localities involved in the projects, will best carry out the purposes of restoration and redevelopment of the Teton disaster area.

"(e) If, at such time as all claims filed under the provisions of this Act (without regard to this section) have been finally settled, the amount actually expended under this Act (without regard to this section) is less than the total of the amounts described in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (b), then such lesser amount shall be deemed to be the total of the amounts described in such paragraphs.".

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, this amendment will allow the use of money which has already been appropriated for the Teton Dam Disaster Recovery Act to be used to the extent it has not been absorbed by the claims for the list of specific projects which EDA had agreed was their share of the recovery effort, and was understood for a year and a half of the 2 years which have transpired since that dam broke, and which they now find difficult in paying. It will not require the appropriation of any additional moneys but would simply allow the somewhat less than $10 million that have not been paid by EDA on the list of projects identified in the amendment so that those projects can be completed as were understood by EDA and all the other Federal agencies that were involved during the efforts to rehabilitate the area devastated by the breaking of the Teton Dam.

Mr. President, as I said, this amendment provides for the remaining appropriated moneys under the Teton Disaster Recovery Act to be utilized for vital economic projects in communities still trying to recover from the Teton Dam failure.

This amendment does not call for new appropriations but merely allows any remaining moneys from the $400 million appropriated in 1976 for the individual claims program to be used for projects such as sewer systems and water systems that have no other source of funding at this time.

The Economic Development Administration has been studying and working with local officials in a five county area on establishing an adjustment program for the Teton disaster area. It has been the understanding since the President's commitment to the Idaho victims 2 years ago, that EDA would assist these communities in funding needed projects. That assistance is not a reality today in spite of the State of Idaho's efforts in complying strictly to EDA criteria. EDA has refused to fund all the needed projects. While the story leading up to our situation today is a long one, the immediacy of getting assistance to these communities is upon us. Because the Teton Recovery Act was passed with the purpose of compensating victims of the disaster, it is appropriate to allow these moneys to continue to be used for the purpose of assisting struggling communities.

It should also be noted that as of July 1, 1978 there was $144 million not expended under the Teton Recovery Act. There are still around 300 claims to be settled. This amendment only allows those moneys not used to settle these remaining claims to be available for economic adjustment projects. It is also estimated that the remaining economic adjustment measures will total around $10 million. It is our hope that once the claims are settled there may be enough moneys left to cover the remaining $10 million in projects. This amendment simply allows this to occur as the money is already appropriated.

The Governor of the State of Idaho, the Congressman from the district, the local officials and citizens are strongly in favor of this amendment. It is also my understanding that the administration has no objection to it. I urge the Senate to accept this amendment today.

I would like to take a few minutes to bring the Senate up to date on the situation in the Teton area today and why we have come to the crossroads of needing this amendment.

As the Senate may recall, on June 5, 1976 as the Teton Dam, a Federal project constructed by the Bureau of Reclamation, collapsed sending flood waters on a path of destruction through a five county area of Southeast Idaho. I, and my colleague from Idaho, have related to this body the tales of losses to human life, private property, and public facilities many times.

The people of the flooded area have now, slightly more than 2 years after the dam's failure, put most of their shattered lives back together again. This was accomplished through an unprecedented cooperation between the Government and the citizens, the likes of which has never been surpassed.

Following the dam's failure, the Congress began to act immediately. Legislation which my colleague and I introduced was approved in record time, providing for complete compensation to flood victims for their physical losses.

The administration and its various departments and agencies reacted immediately with aid, and with a spirit of genuine, helpfulness and willingness to get a common job done.

Now, 2 years after the flood, those totally destroyed communities and the rich surrounding farmland appear again to be prosperous as they once were. Crops are growing on much of the land which has been rehabilitated, and downtown businesses are again open. To this Senator, who was on the scene hours after the dam's failure, and who made his most recent visit to the area within the past week, the transformation is nearly a miracle—but under the surface there are still several loose ends to pick up before the area is again completely whole.

As the Federal structure collapsed, pledges were made by none less than the President, pledges that because this Federal structure failed, the citizens and their surrounding environs would be made whole once again.

Except for one area, I am happy to report that this has been accomplished—the pledges have been honored. Public Law 94-400 which was passed by the Congress provided for the compensation to individuals suffering losses due directly to the dam's failure; $400 million was appropriated for that compensation, with about $300 million expended thus far.

Unfortunately Public Law 94-400 does not compensate local governmental units for all of their losses, some direct, and some indirect. Those local governmental units have suffered losses, partially physical, and partially because of the social upheaval of citizens and rapid rebuilding of cities and towns. Local governments found that the assessed valuation of real and personal property used as a base for local tax revenues, was suddenly no more. Homes were gone, the local tax base was destroyed, and in some cases, flooded victims have now rebuilt at different locations.

Imagine, if you will, that a large number of the citizens of this or any other city suddenly moved from traditional residential areas, to a new location a few miles away. City planners would be hard pressed to provide services such as sewer and water to these newly constructed residences. Drastic modifications would be needed to the cities' system of highways and streets, to their sewer trunk lines, to their water supply systems, to their fire protection system and that upheaval would continue right down to the location of city parks and the municipal library.

This is a realistic example of the types of problems encountered by local governments who suddenly found their towns destroyed, and then almost as suddenly found their towns rebuilt—but rebuilt differently than natural evolution of the community would have allowed.

Local governments, struck suddenly with no real property to assess for taxation, and thousands of their residents homeless, were forced to borrow against future tax revenues to meet immediate pressing demands.

In extraordinary fashion the various Federal agencies divided up the work according to the capabilities of each agency. The Corps of Engineers repaired levies and dikes. The Soil Conservation Service began rehabilitating the farmland. The Federal Disaster Assistance Administration, under the Department of Housing and Urban Development moved in with temporary housing—and the story goes on.

Somewhere, however some projects have fallen between the cracks of the broad Federal rehabilitation platform. As the Federal agencies divided up the work, a portion of the rehabilitation fell to the Economic Development Administration. But now that the urgency of the moment has disappeared, the EDA had pulled in the reins, it has reverted to finding within its rules and regulations the periods and commas which it uses as excuses to renig on previous commitments. So we now find ourselves $5 to $6 million short of funding for work needed on public facilities in the flooded area. Projects such as sewer main extensions, street improvements, storm drain systems and even some dike construction projects.

These needs in public facilities are related to the horrible damage on upheaval caused by the failure of the Teton Dam. It is only just that these final few remaining projects be funded and completed.

Public Law 94-400 authorized the claims program through which those individuals and businesses damaged by the flood could regain their losses; $400 million has been authorized and appropriated to pay these claims.

As I have stated, the amendment which I am offering today simply authorizes that a portion of these already appropriated funds be used to fund these public projects. It is a method of securing funding for a portion of the reconstruction work which the EDA maintains cannot be funded through their regular processes. I submit that the collapse of this Federal dam gives us a set of rather extraordinary circumstances. My amendment only seeks to carry out what the administration and the Congress originally intended, to make the residents of the flooded areas whole again. This amendment seeks no new appropriations of money, it merely seeks to transfer some of the appropriated funds from the claims program to be used for the construction of these few needed projects. Again, I urge the Senate to support our amendment.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I join with the junior Senator from Idaho in offering this amendment to address unfinished Federal business after the Teton Dam disaster of June 6, 1976.

The Teton Dam disaster was a unique tragedy for which the Federal Government bore responsibility. Immediately afterward, all possible assistance was promised to the individuals and communities who were its victims. As part of that assistance, the Economic Development Administration worked with community officials, who formed the Teton Disaster Recovery Organization (TDRO), in order to execute projects for the consequences of the devastating flood after the Teton Dam burst.

EDA helped TDRO write a three volume study, "Adjustment Program for the Teton Disaster Area, 'which included direct and indirect effects of the flood. Most of the projects in this program have been funded, but those for economic assistance have encountered stubborn resistance, despite the fact that they are clearly within the basic mandate of EDA, which helped write them in the first place.

Early this year, fully 18 months after the disaster, I sent a mailgram to EDA urging action on these projects which details the bureaucratic contortions they had suffered. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. CHURCH. Following my mailgram, EDA finally decided to fund only $3.9 million of the $14.2 million which had been requested. EDA has remained adamant in its refusal on the remainder of these funds, and thereby has failed to fulfill its part of the Federal obligation, assumed in the wake of the Teton Dam's collapse. Correspondence I have received from TDRO explains the entire situation clearly, and I ask unanimous consent that it also be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the amendment that Senator MCCLURE and I offer today will serve to meet the Federal responsibility for the Teton Dam disaster in simple and straightforward fashion, without any complication or additional appropriations. It provides that these projects will be funded with any funds that remain after all individual claims and expenses under the Teton Dam Disaster Assistance Act have been taken into account.

This amendment is necessary, Mr. President, because the Teton Dam Disaster Assistance Act limits payments to directly related consequences of the disaster. Economic assistance projects, as we all know, are often only indirectly related to the purposes they serve.

The amendment is limited in two respects. First, the Teton Dam disaster was unique, and precedents set in its aftermath would have applicability only if an identical Federal calamity were ever to occur again. I would point out, Mr. President, that the dam safety legislation which we seek to amend has as its main purpose the avoidance of such disasters.

The second limitation is in the amendment itself, which provides that only those remaining projects in the June 1977 "adjustment program for the Teton disaster area" will be funded in this manner, and I ask unanimous consent that a specific listing of them, the May 1978 "adjustment program for Teton disaster area, summary of remaining economic measures," be printed in the RECORD as part of this amendment's legislative history. In addition, if there are not sufficient funds for all of these projects after all other expenditures are taken into account, then TDRO will work with Federal officials to determine which projects will be funded.

Mr. President, it is a matter of law and tradition that when a wrong has occurred and responsibility is established, the liability is clear and the commitment for compensation is firm. That is the purpose of our amendment, and I urge its adoption by the Senate.

JANUARY 6, 1978

ROBERT T. TALL,
Assistant Secretary for Economic Development, Department of Commercce, Washington, D.C.

I am extremely concerned with the delays the EDA has imposed in dealing with the State of Idaho and Teton Dam Recovery Organization's profile for possible funding of worthy projects through your Title IX program. It has been over 18 months since the failure of the Teton Dam. The need for repair of the ensuing flood damage is long overdue.

Early last year, the State of Idaho submitted a pre-application and profile of projects identified by a detailed study required by your agency. The study cost the counties involved $150,000. The profile, developed from that study, and with the assistance of your Seattle Regional Office, was returned to the applicant by the EDA Review Committee in Washington, D.C., for being unacceptable.

Your objections to the first profile were reworked. A second profile was submitted on November 16, 1977. Local officials in the flood-affected areas, and my Pocatello Field Office, were assured it would be expeditiously handled there, and then sent to Washington for the action of the Review Committee.

My office was notified by your agency that Seattle had finished their work, and had sent the profile to Washington. For over two and one half weeks, I awaited word that the Review Committee had received the profile. My Field Office was told it had arrived one day, the local elected officials were told it had not the next day, and was still en-route.

I understand the profile finally arrived in Washington for consideration during the week of December 12, I was in East Idaho at that time, and talked with the local officials involved. They repeatedly expressed their concern over the lack of cooperation they had received from the EDA.

While in my Pocatello office, I was assured, the Review Committee would meet December 15 or 16 to act on the TDRO proposal. I was also assured the results of that review would be furnished to the Seattle EDA office for notification of the applicants no later than the first of the next week. On December 22nd, I was informed the EDA Seattle office had failed to furnish the proper in-house information needed by the Review Committee to adequately consider the profile, and that it would have to be returned to Seattle for further consideration.

As of today, I have been informed the TDRO profile has not yet been received there.

Because of the background information I have mentioned, it is extremely difficult for me to understand why consideration of this proposal is being delayed. Either there is some reason the EDA refuses to deal with the TDRO project, and will not publically inform those of us interested in it, or this is a case of bureaucratic mismanagement at its worst. Whichever is the reason, I would appreciate your own review of the problems involved, and a report of your findings at the earliest possible time.

Senator FRANK CHURCH.

EAST-CENTRAL IDAHO PLANNING AND DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION, INC.,
Rexburg, Idaho, April 24, 1978.

Hon. FRANK CHURCH,
U.S. Senate, Russell Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR CHURCH: It is now nearly two years since the failure of the Teton Dam. The Teton Disaster Recovery Organization (TDRO) has been working through this period to achieve full economic recovery and adjustments from the aftermath of that disastrous flood. We appreciate the efforts of your office, the offices of other members of the Idaho delegation, and the various Federal agencies which have assisted in our recovery.

Many difficult, "indirect" problems remain. Assistance provided through the Church-McClure bill, particularly, has allowed the FDAA and the Bureau of Reclamation to deal with most of the damage directly associated with the flood waters. Language in that bill has, however, restricted its application to "direct" effects.

Cities, counties and other public agencies have been particularly hard pressed to deal with indirect, but flood caused, problems. Patterns of residence and living have been dramatically changed and speeded up. New areas have been developed for housing, farms and business. Many jobs were permanently lost or changed. Much capital has left the Upper Snake River Valley as former residents chose to take compensation for their damaged homes or businesses and live somewhere else. To deal with such problems, an EDA funded study (Adjustment Program for the Teton Disaster Area, three volumes, June 1977) proposed a two-pronged "adjustment strategy" for "restoration" and "redevelopment". Most restoration needs were covered under the current language of the Church-McClure bill, but a few have not been. Some projects relating to restoring pre-Teton Dam flood control are not yet funded. Also, some projects aimed at providing vital municipal services (water, sewers, and streets) to residents who resettled in new areas of the cities and counties affected have fallen outside of the coverage of the Church-McClure bill.

Projects aimed at economic adjustment have been particularly difficult to get underway. After the flood, local leaders quickly realized that many jobs and resources were permanetly lost. Assistance to individual, private persons, and interests was fraught with problems of inequity and special pleadings. They chose to focus economic adjustment efforts in the public sector. Jobs and development infrastructure would be created, providing an environment conducive to private investment. We had hoped that the EDA would fund many of these projects. They responded, after much prodding, with an agreement to consider applications for projects totaling $3.9 million. These economic adjustment measures are seriously needed, but they include only one-fourth of the items needed. Further, the projects EDA consented to consider focused much of the money outside of the hardest hit areas in Jefferson and Madison Counties.

We are asking that the Church-McClure bill be amended slightly so that funds which were appropriated by Congress in 1976 can be used to complete the Congressional intention of restoration and economic adjustment. We are recommending that the amendment be worded so that only a specific set of projects which now fall outside the coverage of the Church-McClure bill can be funded.

Attached to this letter is a summary of the status of the Teton Disaster Recovery and Economic Adjustment program, the contributions of various Federal agencies to that program, a proposal to amend the Church-McClure bill, and a list of the economic adjustment measures to be included for funding. It should be stressed that these projects have been widely discussed and agreed upon by local leaders and citizens. It is not an extravagant wish list, but a realistic set of measures which will help complete the commitment Congress and the President made to fully restore the Teton Disaster area. The list includes projects for both restoration and redevelopment.

We are indebted to your offices for drafting and assisting in the implementation of the Church-McClure bill. Without your prompt and continous help we could not have accomplished the fantastic level of recovery we have reached so far. We understand there may be serious legislative difficulties if the Church-McClure bill is amended, but we believe that such legislative action is our last remaining option.

Therefore, on behalf of the TRRO, we ask that an amendment be made to the Church-McClure bill to implement the economic adjustment strategy recommended in the Adjustment Program for the Teton Disaster Area.

Respectfully,

JAMES SIDDOWAY,
Commissioner, Fremont County.
JOHN C. PORTER,

I—STATUS OF THE TETON DISASTER ECONOMIC ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

The Teton Disaster Recovery Organization (TDRO) has, after months of effort, failed to complete the outlines of the funding strategy for its Economic Adjustment Strategy (Adjustment Program for the Teton Disaster Area, June, 1977, was financed by EDA). The approach taken in the adjustment strategy was to have the various regular funding authorities, the Federal Disaster Assistance Administration (FDAA), the Soil Conservation Service (SCS), Corps of Engineers, and the Bureau of Reclamation (BuRec's regular and special authority under the Church-McClure "Full Restitution Act") carry their assistance to the limits of their authority. Then, the Economic Development Administration, through its disaster related Title IX authority, pick up the remainder.

TDRO had exhausted the regular authorities and BuRec's special claims authority when EDA began to say that they could not support their part of the approved economic adjustment strategy. EDA has made a first and final offer of only $3.9 million (see letter attached). This leaves $11,440,000 needed to complete the economic adjustment strategy and achieve full economic recovery. This strategy can be fulfilled and full recovery realized without the need for additional appropriation. Possibly as much as $125 million may remain from the original appropriation—less than 10% of the estimated remainder.

II—THE PROBLEM

Why have the existing programs and appropriations not dealt with the full economic adjustment program? The answer is basically the unique character of the disaster and the limitations in authority. There are many secondary and diffuse impacts which most regular and special Federal authorities were not designed to address. What follows is a brief recapitulation of the agencies and their constraints.

The FDAA may only replace those public facilities which were in place and actually flood damaged or directly linked to flood damage (ie. damage done by cleanup crews). The economic adjustment strategy calls for a restoration and redevelopment of the disaster area. The restoration objective is to restore a specific facility or provide a specific capability that was damaged or eliminated by the flood. The development objective is aimed at offsetting the negative indirect economic impacts of the flood.

The SCS will have completed its work and exhausted its funding with the work currently underway on the South Fork of the Teton River. Some river bank habitat conservation measures also have yet to be completed but should be complete this calendar year. SCS is prohibited from further flood control or reclamation work due to a lack of funding and authority (no further work could be done unless flooding occurred or was imminent).

The Corps of Engineers is prevented from restoring the Teton Dam pending Congressional authority and appropriations. The same constraints also control the Bureau of Reclamation.

The Church-McClure "Full Restitution Act", administered by BuRec in the public sphere is merely an extension of FDAA authority as interpreted in its administrative regulations. Nothing may be addressed without the items' previous existence and without direct water damage. Administrative costs for public jurisdictions relating to the disaster may be paid.

One further point should be made about the Church-McClure measure. The Claims Program of BuRec is basically conducted in an adversary atmosphere. Some public claims have come to court cases because of differing interpretations of the law. The Bureau has taken the claims administration very seriously and thus has taken a narrow and strict interpretation of the law.

The EDA Title IX program has also taken a fairly narrow approach to the problems of adjustment. The TDRO feels that it is fair to say that the nature of the adjustment problem and the economic adjustment program has been poorly treated by this agency. Aside from the inefficient and slow response of the agency throughout this case, the EDA has exhibited a poor understanding of the laboriously prepared and costly ($150,000) economic adjustment strategy. Indeed, EDA has also exhibited, from start to finish, a lack of familiarity and understanding of their own Title IX program.

EDA has alternatively pleaded that there was no strategy, then drug its feet to fund one; then, complained there was not time to read and review the study which was prepared; then, pleaded that there were insufficient funds; and has finally wound up using regular Title I and unfunded Title VIII criteria for evaluation purposes. Some of these criteria make very little sense to the localities which labored long and hard to communicate their needs in an effective manner, and also develop an adjustment strategy which would work. EDA ignored the programatic nature of the adjustment strategy which was derived from local plans and priority systems, and reverted to the traditional "project by project", piece meal approach. Nothing so swiftly belies the current strategy oriented emphasis of the EDA as their handling of the Teton Disaster adjustment case.

All of this has been said not so much in a sense of bitterness and frustration, but to point out that as an agency EDA has very little business trying to deal with a disaster, and from a response point of view, is far too bureaucratic to respond in a timely manner. Therefore, despite the fact that it can be shown that the adjustment program is valid and useful, the Economic Development Administration's adjustment program has in essence failed to effectively complete the adjustment financial strategy.

III—THE PROPOSED SOLUTION

With the Claims Program nearing a conclusion (September 28, 1978), the balance of the appropriation estimated to be unexpended ranges between $100 and $125 million. The TDRO proposes that the remaining portion of the unfunded adjustment strategy be completed with the existing disaster appropriations through an amendment to the Church-McClure "Full Restitution Act".

ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM FOR TETON DISASTER AREA—JUNE 1977

SUMMARY OF REMAINING ECONOMIC ADJUSTMENT MEASURES

| | County | Location | Measure | Brief description | Estimated cost | Federal share |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1. | Fremont | City of Parker | Sewage collection system | Public investment substitution for job and income losses which will complete a regional sewer system in disaster impacted county. | $550, 000 | $161, 500 |
| 2. | Fremont | City of Newdale | Rebuilding of city streets | Heavy traffic by recovery crews following disaster and influx of flood victims caused breakup of streets which need replacing. | 100, 000 | 100, 000 |
| 3. | Fremont/Madison | do | Diversion structure on Teton River | Diversion structure capable of providing a measure of flood control now absent with the loss of the Teton Dam. | 200, 000 | 200, 000 |
| 4. | Fremont | do | Water supply, storage distribution | Will replace well and pump worn out by increased use during recovery effort and will also supply storage necessary for a viable system distribution. | 400, 000 | 362, 000 |
| 5. | Fremont | City of St. Anthony | Recreation facilities | Will replace a local recreational capability voided by land and environmental damage due to disaster. | 80, 000 | 60, 000 |
| 6. | Fremont | do | City county jail | Will provide income stream replacement and will replace a facility which is obsolete without overtaxing a tax base not fully restored since the disaster. | 520, 000 | 390, 000 |
| 7. | Fremont | City of Ashton | Street improvements | Street replacement in commercial and industrial area to serve as an income stream replacement. | 808, 000 | 606, 000 |
| 8. | Madison | Rexburg | Barney Dairy Rd | Flood caused displacement sponsored by HUD was poorly placed increasing hazard for both motorist and pedestrian-road to provide safe access. | 206, 000 | 206, 000 |
| 9. | Madison | do | Madison Memorial Hospital | Disaster related funding problems which plaque this new facility's completion can be solved with assistance to complete construction begun immediately after the disaster. | 3, 700, 000 | 800, 000 |
| 10. | Madison | City of Rexburg | Storm drains | Will provide adequate drainage and waste water management which is seriously needed due to flood victim relocation. | 1, 720, 000 | 1, 720, 000 |
| 11. | Madison | do | Water supply | Due to relocation of flood victims the recently installed water storage and distribution system has already become obsolete and in need of expansion. | 1, 090, 000 | 1, 090, 000 |
| 12. | Madison | do | Sewer main extension | Due to flood victim relocation from the plain to Rexburg bench area, there is now a need to extend sewer services. | 210, 000 | 210, 000 |
| 13. | Madison | do | Street improvements | Flood victim relocation requires access roads into areas being settled out of the flood plain on the Rexburg bench. | 527, 000 | 527, 000 |
| 14. | Madison | do | Parking facilities | This redevelopment measure will assure the competitive position of central business district merchants whose livelihood is threatened by proposed "mall-type" developments outside the CBD. | 600, 000 | 450, 000 |
| 15. | Madison | Sugar City | Park facilities | Will provide a replacement for recreation facilities and environment damaged by the Teton disaster and will aid in the redevelopment of the center of Sugar City. | 150, 000 | 112, 500 |
| 16. | Madison | do | Heating district | Funding will be combined with other assistance to verify the existence of a geothermal resource to trigger district heating system development which could make a valuable redevelopment contribution. | 198, 000 | 198, 000 |
| 17. | Madison | City of Rexburg | Fairground arena | Proposal will finish structure begun with FDAA assistance and will replace income streams and jobs lost through public infrastructure reinvestment. | 275, 000 | 206, 250 |
| 18. | Jefferson | City of Roberts | Well and water extension | Relocation and damage done since recovery to assure pure culinary water source requires well replacement and water extensions | 208, 000 | 208, 000 |
| 19. | Jefferson | do | Storm drain | Flood victim relocation and heavy silting now require a much more sophisticated method of wastewater treatment. | 314, 000 | 314, 000 |
| 20. | Jefferson | Cities of Rigby Lewisville, and Menan area. | County Drain District No. 1 | Severe economic impact resulting from high ground water level can be eliminated and an income stream and job replacement achieved. | 800, 000 | 600, 000 |
| 21. | Jefferson | City of Rigby | Recreation facilities | Facility will act as a substitute for recreation areas and environment lost or degraded by he disaster and will also act as an income stream/job replacement reinvestment | 400, 000 | 300, 000 |
| 22. | Jefferson | City of Roberts | CBD beautification | Proposed to stimulate redevelopment of CBD through beautification and will act as an income stream/job replacement investment | 60, 000 | 45, 000 |
| 23. | Jefferson | City of Rigby | Streets and storm drains | A public infrastructure reinvestment will substitute for jobs and income stream losses. | 600, 000 | 450, 000 |
| 24. | Jefferson | City of Rir.e | Sewer and water extensions | Public infrastructure replacement for income stream/job losses resulting from Teton disaster. | 115, 000 | 86, 250 |
| 25. | Bingham | City of Firth | Drainage system | Will reduce ground water level raised by flood, restoring productive capability to surrounding farm land damage by the Teton disaster. | 625, 000 | 307, 000 |
| 26. | Bingham | Blackfoot | Dikes | Will restore dike protecting 450 homes and 3 major potato processing plants (handle 48 percent of Idaho's crop) from potential 100-yr flood. | 216, 000 | 216, 000 |
| 27. | Fremont, Madison, Jefferson, and Bingham. | Areawide | Technical assistance for implementation | A 2-year technical assistance program is called for to suppor the efforts of these disaster area localities in implementing the adjustment program for the Teton disaster area. | 400, 000 | 200, 000 |
| 28. | Total | | | | 15, 072, 000 | 10, 125, 500 |

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, as I understand, the amendment provides for the use of funds which have already been appropriated. I support the amendment and yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. McCLURE. I yield back the remainder of my time, Mr. President.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. All time has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Thomas Robert Dougherty of Senator GLENN's staff be granted the privileges of the floor for today.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment that I offered was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment I offered on behalf of Senators HANSEN and WALLOP of Wyoming was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI).

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1534

(Purpose: To allow accelerated repairs of the Bartlett Dam)

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1534.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 3, line 8, insert the following new section:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to reimburse the Salt River Project for expenses incurred to modify the Bartlett Dam spillway and outfall channel, undertaken for safety of dam purposes pursuant to the provisions of this Act."

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to allow needed modification to be performed on Bartlett Dam, located northeast of Phoenix, Ariz. This modification is necessary to insure the structural integrity of Bartlett and, ultimately, the safety of the inhabitants of Phoenix, Ariz.

Mr. President, my staff, as well as the representatives of the Salt River project, of which the Bartlett Dam is a part, have been in contact with committee members and the staff. It is my understanding that the distinguished floor manager of the bill finds the amendment acceptable.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, as I understand it, this amendment is entirely within the scope of the basic bill. It simply provides that in one particular case, that of the Bartlett Dam in Arizona, the urgent rehabilitation work can go forward with donated funds and be reimbursed later.

Is that not the situation?

Mr. DECONCINI. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I support the amendment. Therefore I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DECONCINI. I yield back the remainder of my time, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RIEGLE). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

The amendment (UP No. 1534) was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DECONCINI. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

LONE PROXMIRE VOTE AGAINST RECLAMATON SAFETY OF DAMS ACT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, with regret I cast my vote against S. 2820, the Reclamation Safety of Dams Act.

I recognize the need for the authority that the Interior Department is seeking to modify existing Bureau of Reclamation dams for safety purposes. Recent events have provided us with unfortunate reminders of the tragic consequences when dams or related structures fail.

I would have fully supported the bill proposed by the administration to deal with the need to undertake remedial construction at existing reclamation dams. Under the administration bill, the costs of safety modification improvements would have been apportioned among the beneficiaries of each project in the same proportion as the beneficiaries' repayment of original dam construction costs. Under existing repayment policy, those who benefit from these Reclamation Bureau projects, especially agriculture irrigators, already receive generous subsidies from the Federal treasury.

Unfortunately, the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee followed the precedent of the House Interior Committee and amended the adminisrtation bill to declare that all costs incurred under this legislation will be nonreimbursable and nonreturnable under reclamation law. What this means is that once again the Senate has chosen to ignore the "user pay" principle. Instead of requiring those who benefit from these reclamation projects to pay for their maintenance, all the taxpayers are required to foot the bill.

I appreciate the need to insure that Federal projects pose no dangers to those they are designed to help. At the same time, Mr. President, I do not feel that safety modifications should be made from the general revenues collected from taxpayers who in no way benefit directly from these projects.

Safety improvements, like any other, are an essential part of the capital investment made in reclamation projects. Without such improvements, the beneficiaries will not be able to continue to realize the fruits of thier original investment. In my judgement, project users should be required to pay for the costs of safety improvements in the same proporiton as they paid original project costs.

I am concerned that the Senate's action is passing this bill runs seriously counter to President Carter's water policy reform efforts which seek to improve the repayment procedures for projects administered by the Bureau of Reclamation. I hope that my colleagues in the House of Representatives will be successful in restoring the repayment requirements of the administration bill.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I know of no further request for time and I suggest we go to third reading.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. All time having been yielded back and the bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN), the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. EASTLAND), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), the Senator from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. MATSUNAGA), and the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), and the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), would each vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Virginia (Mr. SCOTT), the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP), are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP), and the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE), would each vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 77, nays 1, as follows:

So the bill (S. 2820) was passed, as follows:

S. 2820

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act shall be cited as the "Reclamation Safety of Dams Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. In order to preserve the structural safety of Bureau of Reclamation dams and related facilities the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to perform such modifications as he determines to be reasonably required. Said performance of work shall be in accordance with the Federal reclamation laws (Act of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 388, and Acts amendatory or supplementary thereto).

SEC. 3. Construction authorized by this Act shall be for the purposes of dam safety and not for the specific purposes of providing additional conservation storage capacity or of developing benefits over and above those provided by the original dams and reservoirs. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to reduce the amount of project costs allocated to reimbursable purposes heretofore authorized.

SEC. 4. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to pay and discharge that portion of the costs associated with the replacement of the American Falls Dam which the irrigation spaceholder contracting entities are obligated to pay pursuant to the implementation of the Act of December 28, 1973 (87 Stat. 904), to treat such costs as costs incurred under this Act, and to enter into contracts to the extent and in the amounts provided in appropriations Acts with the irrigation spaceholder contracting entities to accomplish the payment and discharge of such costs.

SEC. 5. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to reimburse the Salt River Project for expenses incurred to modify the Bartlett Dam spillway and outfall channel, undertaken for safety of dam purposes pursuant to the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 6. All costs heretofore or hereafter incurred pursuant to this Act shall be nonreimbursable and nonreturnable under reclamation law.

SEC. 7. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, effective October 1, 1978, such sums as may be necessary, but not to exceed $100,000,000, to carry out the provisions of this Act: Provided, That no funds shall be obligated for carrying out actual construction to modify an existing dam under authority of this Act prior to sixty days (which sixty days shall not include days on which either the House of Representatives or the Senate is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three calendar days to a date certain) from the date that the Secretary has transmitted a report on such existing dam to the Congress. The report required to be submitted by this section will consist of a finding by the Secretary of the Interior to the effect that modifications are required to be made to insure the safety of an existing dam. Such findings shall be accompanied by a technical report containing information on the need for structural modification, the corrective action deemed to be required, alternative solutions to structural modification that were considered, the estimated cost of needed modifications, and environmental impacts if any resulting from the implementation of the recommended plan of modification.

SEC. 8. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed, notwithstanding the terms of the contract number 14-06-100-7174, to make necessary repairs on the Scoggins Valley Road around Henry Hagg Lake, Oregon, at Federal expense pursuant to the authority of Public Law 89-596 which authorized the construction operation and maintenance of the Tualatin Reclamation Project in Oregon.

SEC. 9. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to perform such modifications as he determines to be reasonably required to provide safe public access to the existing public viewing areas of the Buffalo Bill Dam. Such modifications may be made from funds appropriated under section 7 of this Act.

SEC. 10. The proviso contained in section 201 of the Colorado River Basin Project Act (43 U.S.C. 1511) is amended by striking out "ten years" and inserting in lieu thereof "twenty years".

SEC. 11. Public Law 95-226 is amended by adding at the conclusion of the first section the following sentence: "There is authorized to be appropriated such funds as may be necessary, but under no circumstances, more than $1,500,000, to complete the following projects initiated under the Emergency Drought Act of 1977: Acoma Pueblo Project, Isleta Pueblo Project, San Ildefonso Pueblo Project, San Juan Pueblo Project, Taos Pueblo Project, Tesuque Pueblo Project, Zia Pueblo Project, Pala Mission Project, Rincon Mission Project, Morongo Mission Project, LaJoya Project, Pauma Project, San Carlos Apache Project, Gila River Project, Pyramid Lake Project, Summit Lake Project, and Yerington Paiute Project.".

SEC. 12. The Act entitled "An Act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make compensation for damages arising out of the failure of the Teton Dam a feature of the Teton Basin Federal reclamation project in Idaho, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1976 (Public Law 94-400) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 13. (a) Any funds authorized to be appropriated by section 12 of this Act, which are determined under subsection (b) to be excess funds, shall be made available by the Secretary for the purpose of carrying out projects under the Adjustment Program for the Teton Disaster Area (including related administrative costs), and such funds shall remain available until expended.

"(b) For purposes of this section, the term 'excess funds' means those funds authorized to be appropriated under section 12, and appropriated under the Act approved July 12, 1976 (Public Law 94-355) or the Act approved September 30, 1976 (Public Law 94-438), in excess of the total of—

"(1) the amount expended under this Act (including related administrative costs) prior to September 30, 1978 (or the date of the enactment of this section, if later),

"(2) the amount of outstanding claims timely filed under this Act which have not been paid as of September 30, 1978 (or the date of the enactment of this section, if later), and

"(3) the amount of the future administrative costs (as estimated by the Secretary) which will be incurred in carrying out the provisions of this Act (without regard to this section) after September 30, 1978 (or the date of the enactment of this section, if later), but the amount of excess funds as so determined shall not exceed the amount of funds required to complete the projects under the Adjustment Program for the Teton Disaster Area (including related administrative costs).

"(c) For purposes of this section, the term 'projects under the Adjustment Program for the Teton Disaster Area' means only the Federal share of those projects described in the study funded by the Economic Development Agency and specified in the document entitled Adjustment Program for the Teton Disaster Area, Summary of Remaining Economic Adjustment Measures, May 1978, which have not been otherwise funded prior to September 30, 1978 (or the date of the enactment of this section, if later).

"(d) If the amount of excess funds as determined under this section is less than the amount required to complete the projects under the Adjustment Program for the Teton Disaster Area, the Secretary shall distribute such funds among such projects in such manner as he determines, after consultation with any localities involved in the projects, will best carry out the purposes of restoration and redevelopment of the Teton disaster area.

"(e) If, at such time as all claims filed under the provisions of this Act (without regard to this section) have been finally settled, the amount actually expended under this Act (without regard to this section) is less than the total of the amounts described in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (b), then such lesser amount shall be deemed to be the total of the amounts described in such paragraphs.".

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make any necessary technical and clerical corrections in the engrossment of S. 2820.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR—S. 2152

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Bill Reinsch and Mr. Barry Johnson, of my staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor during consideration of S. 2152.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanmious consent that Tom Getman, of my staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor during consideration of the IMF bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Jim Bond, of the Appropriations Committee staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor during consideration and voting on the International Monetary Fund bill.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENT ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1978

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of S. 2152, which the clerk will state by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2152) to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act to authorize the United States to participate in the Supplementary Financing Facility of the International Monetary Fund.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs with an amendment to strike all of the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the Bretton Woods Agreements Act (22 U.S.C. 286–286k–2) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 28. (a) For the purpose of participation of the United States in the Supplementary Financing Facility (hereinafter referred to as the 'facility') established by the decision numbered 5508–(77/127) of the Executive Directors of the Fund, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make resources available as provided in the decision numbered 5509–(77/127) of the Fund, in an amount not to exceed the equivalent of 1,450 million Special Drawing Rights.

"(b) The Secretary of the Treasury shall account, through the fund established by section 10 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 (31 U.S.C. 822a), for any adjustment in the value of monetary assets held by the United States in respect of United States' participation in the facility.".

SEC. 2. (a) Section 3(c) of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act (22 U.S.C. 286a(c)) is redesignated as section 3(c)(1) and amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) The United States executive director of the Fund shall not be compensated by the Fund at a rate in excess of the rate provided for an individual occupying a position at level IV of the Executive Schedule under section 5315 of title 5, United States Code. The United States alternate executive director of the Fund shall not be compensated by the Fund at a rate in excess of the rate provided for an individual occupying a position at level V of the Executive Schedule under section 5316 of title 5, United States Code.

"(3) The Secretary of the Treasury shall instruct the United States executive director of the Fund to present to the Fund's Executive Board a comprehensive set of proposals, consistent with maintaining high levels of competence of Fund personnel and consistent with the Articles of Agreement, with the objective of assuring that salaries and other compensation accorded Fund employees do not exceed those received by persons filling similar levels of responsibility within national government service or private industry. The Secretary shall report these proposals together with any measures adopted by the Fund's Executive Board to the Congress prior to February 1, 1979.".

(b) Upon entry into force of the amendment to the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund approved in Resolution Numbered 31–4 of the Board of Governors of the Fund, section 3(c) of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, as amended by subsection (a), shall be redesignated as section 3(d) of such Act, and the text of section 3(d)(1) of such Act shall be amended to read as provided in section 2(2) of Public Law 94–564.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Janice O'Connell and Karin Lissakers, of the Foreign Relations Committee staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor during consideration of this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I am happy to yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Gary Welsh, of my staff, and Robert Russell, of the Banking Committee staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor during consideration of this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. The same request for Jack Gorland, of my staff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, will my colleague yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I make the same request for Charles McQuillen, of the Budget Committee staff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mrs. ALLEN) I ask unanimous consent that a member of her staff, Richard Gentry, be accorded the privilege of the floor during consideration and voting on S. 2152.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, may I make a similar request on behalf of Mr. Ralph Nurnberger, of the Foreign Relations Committee staff?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, S. 2152, the pending bill, contains, at line 21 on page 2 through line 4 on page 3, an authorization for the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into a contract under which the United States is obligated to make outlays, the budget authorization for which is not provided for in advance by appropriation acts. That authorization fits the description of new spending authority contained in section 401(c)(2)(A) of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974.

Under section 401(a) of the Budget Act, it is not in order for the Senate to consider any bill which provides such new spending authority unless the bill provides that such new spending authority is to be effective only to such an extent, or in such amounts, as are provided in appropriation acts.

Mr. President, my inquiry is if a point of order were raised under section 401(a) of the Budget Act, would that point of order lie?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises that the bill has been studied and the point that the Senator has raised does speak to a violation of section 401(b) of the Budget Act; therefore, if a point of order were made, it would be sustained on that basis.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, it would be my hope that the managers of the bill would amend it to get around this point of order by making appropriate provision pursuant to the Budget Act. If the Senator from Idaho, now speaking, does not raise the point of order now but awaits until they have the opportunity to so amend the act, do I waive the opportunity to make the point of order?

Mr. JAVITS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would respond by saying that the Senator does not waive his right by waiting to raise his point of order later.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank my colleague for yielding, and it is my hope they will conform the bill to the Budget Act so that a point of order would not lie, and that the Senator now speaking would not then raise the point of order. But I would want the managers of the bill to know that unless it is so amended I will make that point of order.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the issue raised by the parliamentary inquiry will not go unchallenged. It is a very key aspect of the bill because one of the amendments which will be proposed to the bill, we understand, is an amendment respecting appropriations.

The position which the managers of the bill will take—at least this manager and, I believe, others, and there are four of us who are managing the bill because it comes out of two committees—is that this represents a change of assets. The United States simply buys an asset in the International Monetary Fund in the way of a subscription, and it does not represent an appropriation of money of the United States.

If, as, and when the U.S. subscription is called on, other than the actual making of the contract, which is authorized by this statute, then there may be the need for an appropriation. But until such time occurs there is no need for an appropriation.

If what is desirable is that we shall say that in the text, to wit, that if, as, and when money is required an appropriation will be sought, and all this does is authorize one, that is another matter. But if it is claimed that this represents an authorization for appropriation in the usual sense then we will have to challenge that, and it may very well be that we would have to, if the Chair persists in that ruling, appeal from the ruling of the Chair and leave it to the Senate.

I would rather hope, with all respect to the Parliamentarian and the Chair, that this question would have been put to the Senate before it was decided on a parliamentary inquiry.

But, nonetheless, that may be the way, because I have every confidence in the Parliamentarian, in which the language which we have is construable. So I deeply appreciate, as always, the graciousness, fairness, and accommodation of my colleague, Senator McCLURE, and we will examine the language very carefully in the time which is allowed to us now with the idea in mind of making sure that as far as we are concerned, even under our construction of the law, this bill qualifies, to wit. that when, as, and if money is needed to back up our subscription there will be an appropriation, and the bill will make that clear.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

I take this time now only because I want the record to reflect what the varying views are. I appreciate the comments of my colleague from New York because I do know that the Treasury has maintained all along the position that payments to the IMF are like deposits in a bank where Treasury funds are kept pursuant to withdrawal. Therefore, Treasury contends that these payments are not expenditures but merely an "exchange of monetary assets."

In short, the Treasury would lead us to believe that a special drawing right (SDR) is like a certificate of deposit (CD) for Treasury funds at Riggs Bank. Nothing could be further from the truth. The CD is liquid while the SDR can be redeemed only to the extent that the IMF asserts that the United States is in a severe balance-of-payments position and some other country is willing to accept the SDR for its own currency.

Aside from the merits of the Witteveen Facility itself, the exchange-of-assets concept poses substantial problems as a precedent for future financing activities. Under the reasoning advanced by the Treasury, it would be possible to set up a bank to finance some activity—energy development or urban development, for example. The Treasury could then deposit in the bank such sums as it deemed appropriate and obtain in return a certificate of deposit. The bank would have the use of U.S. funds, which the Treasury would treat as assets on deposit in the bank. And all this could be accomplished without congressional approval. The potential for this technique as a new form of backdoor spending is almost unlimited.

That is the reason why I am absolutely confident that it is a violation of the Budget Act. I would have made the point of order except I wanted to give the managers of the bill the opportunity to correct the defect in the legislation rather than barring its consideration and requiring that it go back to the committee.

I would be happy to yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, I want vigorously to support the argument of the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. McCLURE). We have been discussing this off and on privately throughout this calendar year, indeed, prior thereto.

Throughout the year, I and others have been asked to attend meetings for the purpose of trying to resolve this institutional issue. But, the meetings were never called or were canceled. Meanwhile, S. 2152 has been languishing on the Senate calendar.

There is no question that a point of order lies to this bill, in its present form, under my interpretation of the Budget Act. I will not undertake to describe or define the interpretation at this point because, I take it, we will have ample opportunity to do that later on. But I would like to suggest that what is important with respect to the Witteveen facility is that the certainty of American participation be established.

I really doubt that our partners in this effort abroad are concerned as to the integrity of our bookkeeping arrangements. They are more concerned about the certainty of our commitment. It is unfortunate that this delay has taken place, this delay in implementing the Witteveen facility, whose purposes I thoroughly subscribe to, because of bookkeeping arrangements that are mandated, in my judgement, by the Budget Act.

If we permit this exception, and the Senate accedes to this exception that is being urged by the floor managers of this legislation, we open a very wide door indeed, not only with respect to international legislation, but with respect to legislation having domestic impact. What is being urged apparently is that we approve a token appropriation which can then be the basis for unlimited commitment to obligations far exceeding the amount of the original appropriation.

If that is not inconsistent with the accountability which the Budget Act imposes upon us, then I do not recognize the mandate of the Budget Act which I have been charged to support for now some 4 years.

I will not go into it further at this point, but I will have ample opportunity later to define my understanding of the Budget Act as it applies. I state again: It is unfortunate that we are going to be involved in a step which delays further implementation of the IMF supplementary financing concept. But that is the way it has to be. I feel very strongly about this situation, and I want to make that point clear at the outset of the debate.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield very briefly?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator from Idaho yielding?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho (Mr. McCLURE) has the floor and he yielded to the Senator from Maine. But I gather he is yielding——

Mr. McCLURE. I yield the floor.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I would like to respond briefly to the remarks of the Senator from Maine, the able chairman of the Budget Committee, as well as to the remarks of my colleague, Senator McCLURE. It may be that there need be no problem concerning this matter.

First of all, I think we ought to get the facts straight with respect to this Witteveen facility.

The contributions that we would make to the Witteveen facility differ from ordinary contributions that the United States makes from time to time to the International Monetary Fund in this respect: The money which the United States provides to the Witteveen facility under the provisions of this bill will be repaid to us in eight semiannual installments beginning 3½ years after the financing is provided. The funds will be repaid with interest, covering the cost of borrowing to the Treasury, so there will be no net interest costs involved.

So let it be clear that both the principal and interest will be repaid. The only possible potential loss that could result from U.S. participation would come about if there is a change in the relative exchange rates between the dollar and the SDR during the period in which our contribution is outstanding.

If the dollar appreciates against other currencies during that period, the Treasury will get back fewer dollars than it paid in. If the dollar depreciates during that period, the converse will be true: our Treasury will get back more dollars than it paid in.

It is my understanding that the President has included in his 1978 supplementary budget request a $200 million contingency reserve to meet the potential exchange loss which might result from U.S. participation in the facility.

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, I would like to yield, because I do not think that it is necessary for us to have a collision on this question. All we are attempting to do is to accurately ascertain the extent of the liability and the possible cost.

Mr. MUSKIE. The difficulty I have with the Senator's argument is that all across the budget, we have programs involving direct loans—in agriculture, for example. And the dollar amount of those loans has to be appropriated, notwithstanding the fact that in many cases they are totally repaid without loss to the Treasury. We in Congress have to account for the drain on national resources.

So the fact that this is in the nature of a direct loan, if this is an accurate description of it, does not differentiate it from other programs, policies, or transactions which involve direct loans. That is not a distinction that has any persuasiveness so far as the Budget Act is concerned. All must be fully accounted for by appropriations.

Loan guarantees are sometimes treated differently. However, Witteveen is most comparable to a direct loan. If we were to extend that kind of a precedent here, then I am sure that before long we would have committees coming to the Senate floor and arguing that really the full amount of the program that they are requesting should not be charged against them, because it is their estimate that only 10 percent may represent an ultimate loss, so we do not have to worry about the 90 percent which will be repaid.

I can see all sorts of precedents offered, then, for expansion of our obligations, based upon that kind of loan, because of someone's estimate on the amount of loss which may or may not ultimately occur. It is to close that back door that section 401 of the Budget Act was written into law.

So I think the Senator needs to make a very careful distinction based on that point.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, will my colleague yield for one further comment?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I would hope that the Senator from Maine might also distinguish between the International Monetary Fund and the more conventional types of loans made by our Government for various domestic purposes.

This fund is, after all, an international fund. It is owned by the participating governments that contribute to it. We have special drawing rights in connection with it, should we, because of our own balance-of-payments deficit require assistance from the fund.

So I do not quite understand the Senator's fear that passing the bill in its present form would create a dangerous precedent.

In the past, when the United States has made contributions to the fund where no appropriation has been required, it has been regarded as a deposit of an asset by the U.S. Government in international funds in which we participate and in which we have rights.

The Witteveen facility seems to me to be an especially poor place to change past practice, because here we not only deposit the asset with a drawing right should we need it, but we do so under the terms of a special facility which is temporary in character, and which expressly undertakes the obligation of repaying the full amount with interest.

I think this is a unique situation, quite different from the kind to which the Senator refers, and I wonder if we really even assume any risk of establishing some precedent that might come to afflict other loan operations.

I think not. I think this is unique.

Mr. MUSKIE. Let me say, first of all, it is not the question of a risk which is the only reason why the Budget Act requires that we account for drains upon the Treasury.

Not every dollar spent out of the Treasury in the form of domestic or international loans means 100 percent risk. It is not just a question of risk; it is the question of accounting to the taxpayer for resources that we commit, that are not then available for other purposes.

With respect to the IMF, in 1976 the IMF received appropriations as it had since it began its operations in 1946.

The second point is that I am not the one seeking to make an exception; it is the distinguished floor manager of the bill and those associated with him who are trying to make an exception to the Budget Act.

As to the argument that all that is involved is an exchange of assets between the Treasury and the special drawing rights, in short, meaning that somehow it should be regarded as taking the matter out of the Budget Act, the fact is that the asset we get for the money paid, that is, the special drawing right, is restricted. It is not readily usable to the same extent as the funds paid in.

Their use is restricted because they are available only if the United States officially submits a request to the IMF, formally stating a balance of payments need, and the executive board approves the request and issues a decision to that effect.

Although the United States could theoretically sell its holding to another major contributor to the facility willing to purchase the U.S. holding, there is no certainty that such a sale could be arranged. It is not an exchange of equal assets, as I understand it.

But second, if we were to accept the exchange of assets argument, then we would have to be concerned, Mr. President, about the application of such an exchange of assets concept in areas which traditionally do undergo appropriations action, and are counted fully as budget authority.

For example, take the case of the U.S. purchases of oil for strategic petroleum reserves.

The U.S. purchases of oil for strategic petroleum reserves are counted as budget authority in full, as are virtually all other exchange of assets transactions. Under S. 2152 as originally introduced, the administration would have covered exchange losses from the off-budget exchange stabilization fund without any appropriation. In fact, the oil is much more liquid in its value than the SDR's in the facility. The exchange of assets idea could eliminate from the budget all direct loans as they would be construed as exchange of assets. For example, dollars for mortgages, mortgages in the domestic field or elsewhere. We would be exchanging dollars for mortgages, for housing or any other purpose. Or Treasury might be authorized to set up a bank to finance some activity such as energy or urban development without any appropriation or budget authority.

Treasury could deposit funds in the bank, obtaining in return a certificate of deposit, like the SDR rights. The bank would have the use of the funds which Treasury could treat as any asset in a bank. Under Treasury's reasoning, only a small sum, if any, covering potential losses, would be appropriate as budget authority although direct funding of the same activities by the U.S. Government would require appropriation and budget authority for the full amount.

These are the kinds of consequential results that we have to guard against if we loosely interpret the Budget Act in order to open the door for this particular application. As a precedent for some such urgings by other Members of the Senate or by other committees, I think the logic is directly relevant to what we are being asked to consider.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, just so the RECORD is not left with a contradiction as to the facts, I have been advised that no appropriation has been required for deposits in the IMF by the United States since 1973. It was at that time that the Congress accepted the Presidential argument that this was a deposit of assets. Appropriations have not been required since that date.

The Senator is correct that before 1968 it was the practice to appropriate the money.

I simply want to get the facts straight between us.

Mr. MUSKIE. I think we should add another fact, that the Budget Act was enacted in 1974, which had made no exceptions with respect to back door spending authority in either foreign policy or domestic policy. There is a reason there was an authorization to establish the need and then an appropriation to establish the justification as among competing priorities. That has been the basis of our appropriations process at least since I have been in the Senate and for a long time before. There is an authorization to establish the need and an appropriation then to permit priorities to compete for the resources available in the Treasury. It is for the reason of protecting that procedure and that practice that this provision was written into the Budget Act.

It was written in because increasingly in the domestic field and the foreign field there had been efforts by authorizing committees to bypass the appropriation process. By so doing, life became easier. I was guilty of it myself. The Public Works Committee, at that time, in seeking to enlarge the program of waste treatment facilities, wrote into our legislation contract authority which, in effect, bypassed the Appropriations Committee.

Other committees were doing the same thing. The Foreign Relations Committee and other committees interested in foreign policy obligations were doing the same thing.

The Budget Act was designed to reimpose the discipline implicit in that two-pronged approach, authorizations to establish need and appropriations to insure that among all the competing priorities for Federal funds there is room for a particular priority.

We ought not lightly retreat from that policy which was reenshrined in the Budget Act of 1974.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I will in a moment. I would point out first that following the enactment of the Budget Act, in 1975 and again in 1976 American contributions to the International Monetary Fund were made.

Mr. McCLURE. Will my colleague yield briefly?

Mr. CHURCH. I did promise to yield to Senator McCLURE. Then I will yield to Senator STEVENSON.

Mr. McCLURE. There is some difference regarding the facts. I have been advised that only in 1976 was the U.S. contribution to the IMF permitted without appropriations. I think in every other year since 1946 the U.S. contributions have gone through a regular appropriations process.

As I say, I may be in error on that.

Mr. CHURCH. I would call my colleague's attention to a statement appearing on page 31 of the committee report, which reads:

> In July 1975, Treasury officials explained to Congress (in letters from Assistant Secretary Charles A. Cooper to Chairmen Reuss, Mahon, Sparkman, Proxmire and McClellan) that no appropriation would be sought to meet the U.S. maintenance of value obligations to the IMF that resulted from the reduction in the SDR value of the dollar during the IMF fiscal year ending April 30, 1975.

So on this occasion, as well as in 1976, no appropriation was sought and Congress did not impose such a requirement even though the Budget Act was passed.

Mr. MUSKIE. May I clarify the RECORD on that point? Frankly, we were asleep, some of us. It has not been an easy task to watch all of you geniuses undertake your work under the Budget Act without changing too many of your hats. Some of these slip by. The 1976 action was not taken as an explicit definition of the requirements of the Budget Act. The question was not raised. It was not raised because we in the Budget Committee were asleep at that point. We were occupied with other responsibilities; we did not fully understand our new mandate.

In the absence of an explicit definition with respect to 1976, that constitutes no precedent for the action we are being urged to take today. We are now in a position to take a clearcut definition and a clearcut precedent which will guide our future actions. It is because we slipped in 1976, in part; it is because we do not want to see this precedent growing into a wide open door with respect to government operations in the domestic field, that we are raising this issue today.

Clearly, if the Congress and the Senate wish to open the door to back-door spending once more, it can take a first step today, whatever my view or whatever the view of Senator McCLURE, my good friend from Idaho. Whatever our view, the Senate can decide to open that door today. All I am trying to do is to say in my judgment the Budget Act does not permit it. It can be bypassed, it can be run around, it can be abrogated, in effect, by whatever we do, but in my judgment it is not permitted.

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the Senator from Illinois who has studied this matter with great care.

Mr. STEVENSON. I thank the Senator from Idaho for his yielding.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair apologizes for interjecting, but will the Senator from Illinois use his microphone?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I rise only to commend and support the Senator from Maine. I think it is very important that the incident that occurred in 1976 be overriden, if it is necessary to so do, to erase that precedent today.

I think it is very important that the budget concept, as so clearly delineated by the chairman of the Committee on the Budget, be upheld by the Senate. After all, we are dealing with $1.7 billion of tax funds taken from the American working people. Regardless of what the technicalities might be, it seems to me only logical that that fund, any such fund, should be appropriated and not just assumed to have been appropriated.

I support the position taken by the chairman of the Committee on the Budget.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR

The following Senators requested and, by unanimous consent, the privilege of the floor was granted in behalf of the following staff members: Parliamentarian's Office: Mandy Ochoa; Mr. JAVITS: Jacques Gorlan; Mr. PROXMIRE: Kenneth McLean and Ron Tammen; Mr. MUSKIE: Tom Dine, Charles Flickner, Sidney Brown, Liz Tankersley, and John McEvoy of the Budget Committee staff; HARRY F. BYRD, Jr.: Edward Beck and John Brooks; Mr. McCLURE: Howard Segermark of Mr. HELMS' staff; Mr. CHURCH: Ira Nordlicht.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Will the Senator from Illinois yield for a minute?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield for a half-minute to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. As the chairman surely knows, the Schweiker amendment goes to the heart of this issue. I am prepared to offer it, since all debate seems to be on this issue as the issue, whenever managers of the bill deem appropriate. It seems to me we are in the amendment already and that is the issue. I wonder what the concept of the managers of the bill is as to when that will be appropriate to offer or in how much time to proceed.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I, for one, hope that the Members, or at least of those of the floor managers of the bill who wish to do so, will have an opportunity to make opening statements before offering amendments. I have not had that opportunity, nor, for that matter, has anyone, since this subject which was raised prematurely. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania and the others might at least afford us that opportunity. How long it will take, I do not know, because I do not know how many other Members have opening statements. I have one.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. I appreciate that. I raised the question because that is where the whole debate seemed to go.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield very briefly?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield very briefly.

Mr. McCLURE. I do apologize for raising this issue at the outset. I did it essentially in order to make certain that the point of order would not be waived and I did not wish to lose the opportunity. I understand the frustration of the managers of the bill, who are debating an issue that is extraneous to the reasons for the bill. But before getting back to the opening statements on the merits of the legislation, let me just remind the Senate that the Senate, earlier this year, adopted the conference report on the budget resolution. That conference report on the budget resolution, on page 5, contains this language under function 150, international affairs:

> The Senate resolution provided budget authority of $12.8 billion and outlays of $7.2 billion. The House resolution provided budget authority of $10.990 billion and outlays of $6,600 billion. The conference substitute provides budget authority of $12.8 billion and outlays of $6.9 billion. The conference substitute includes $1.8 billion in budget authority above the House resolution only to provide for the possibility that implementation of the Witteveen Facility of the International Monetary Fund will be delayed until fiscal year 1979 and that the entire amount will be appropriated.

I take the time only to lay before the Senate the fact that the Senate has already said, in the budget report adopted by the Senate, that this would be subject to an appropriation.

Mr. JAVITS. May I ask the Senator this question?

Mr. McCLURE. Surely.

Mr. JAVITS. Would he agree on the law, even on his version, that, therefore, this particular matter comes within the exception of section 303 and that, being provided for in the budget, we may pass this bill provided that we condition the subscription upon being made October 1, 1978, or thereafter? That is the very thrust of what the Senator has just said.

Mr. McCLURE. No, that is not the thrust of what the Senator has said and I am sorry my friend misunderstood.

The fact is that this requires an appropriation and section 401 of the Budget Act says contract authority must be specifically appropriated.

Mr. JAVITS. Yes, but we are talking now about the passage of this bill. The Senator asked for an amendment. I asked the Senator whether an amendment saying that the subscription shall be not earlier than October 1, 1979, would mean exactly what the Budget Committee said in bringing in its report—to wit, that we can pass the bill;—there is no point of order against it—provided that it is not subscribable until October 1, 1979, and it comes within the budget and whatever ensues at that time can be argued about. But it would obviate the point of order against the bill and we could go ahead and do our business.

Mr. McCLURE. I would not agree with my friend from New York that that is the manner by which we can obviate the necessity of going through the budget process.

Mr. JAVITS. I did not say we obviated it.

Mr. McCLURE. The Budget Act requires that contract authority be budgeted and appropriated. This has not been done and, therefore, under section 401 of the Budget Act, it is out of order to consider the legislation.

Rather than make the point of order at the outset, barring the Senate from considering the bill, I put it in the form of a parliamentary inquiry so we could raise the issue, give the managers the opportunity to amend the bill to conform to the Budget Act, rather than simply raising the point of order and making it out of order to consider the bill today.

Mr. JAVITS. Obviously, the Senator does not prefer to deal with my question. My question was exactly that: If we conform to the Budget Act by making this subscription October 1, 1978, then, in my opinion, we simply reserve the question as to appropriation until an effort is made to subscribe. At that time, we can deal with it by appropriation or otherwise.

Obviously, the Senator does not agree with me, so I shall bide my time.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield on that?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes.

Mr. McCLURE. I think we have run into the problem where it would require a third resolution, because there is not enough room for the 1.8 in fiscal year 1978.

Mr. JAVITS. I think we are passing each other in the night, but we shall deal with it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that William Weber, of the Banking Committee, be granted the privilege of the floor during consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLINGS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to make an opening statement about this bill, but I think we are into this issue prematurely. The Senator from New York put a question. The approval by the Congress of the U.S. quota increase in the International Monetary Fund in 1976 has been approved. I believe I was the manager at the time. The Senator from Maine is the authority on the Budget Committee and it certainly is possible it was asleep at the time.

I can say, as he has indicated, the question was never raised about compliance with the Budget Act or the necessity of an appropriation.

But that was, I believe, the one precedent, the first and one precedent, established by the Congress since enactment of the Budget Act. Regardless of whether the Budget Committee was asleep, it was approved, and it was approved with the understanding that this involved initially an exchange of assets.

That is the understanding of every country on Earth. There is not another country, including our own executive branch, that does not regard participation in the International Monetary Fund as anything other than an exchange of assets. They do so, first, because they do not wish to run any unnecessary risks of politicizing the International Monetary Fund.

Most democratic countries, perhaps all, do not require any legislative approval at all within their governments.

Mr. MUSKIE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Let alone participation in the appropriations process.

I would like to finish this, if I may, and then come back to the Senator.

The reason is that it is more akin to a bank deposit than it is an outlay which must compete for congressional or legislative authorizations or appropriations for national defense, housing, or anything else.

This debate has so far been confused by a failure to distinguish between the initial participation in the IMF which involves, I believe, an exchange of assets from the general fund. The second question is, What happens if as a result of that participation there is a loss?

The mere exchange of assets by itself should not involve an appropriation, because that, by itself, does not involve a loss, but a loss could occur subsequently.

Of course, a gain could occur, too.

That loss can be covered out of the exchange stabilization fund.

The balance in the Exchange Stabilization Fund is about $4 billion.

The Exchange Stabilization Fund is an off-budget fund. Expenditures from the Exchange Stabilization Fund for exchange rate losses, for losses as a result of participation in the IMF, do not require an appropriation, do they?

Mr. JAVITS. That is correct.

If we could have the attention of the Senator from Maine, Senator STEVENSON is raising the whole issue of the swaps, the currency swaps, and the many other stabilization activities of the stabilization fund as being outside the budget process.

I just wanted to call that to the attention of the Senator.

Mr. MUSKIE. We are not swapping equivalent assets. When we talk about swapping dollars out of the general fund of Treasury for an increased international reserve position denominated in special drawing rights, SDR's are not used in the same way as dollars.

I observed the Senator listening closely to me when I made that point.

Mr. JAVITS. What is the difference between swapping dollars for, let us say for the sake of argument, French francs, which is done constantly, and swapping dollars for SDR's? They are a form of currency.

Mr. MUSKIE. What is the difference between swapping dollars for SDR's or swapping dollars for oil, petroleum, to be put in the oil reserve?

Mr. JAVITS. I think there is a difference.

Mr. MUSKIE. We can make any difference we want. But if what the Senator is saying is that when any asset is acquired, for instance SDR's in return for Treasury dollars, there is justification, for accountability purposes to reduce the amount of dollars put in the budget to the amount equal to the risk value that it may lose. Thus all we have to account for is the amount of that risk——

Mr. JAVITS. May I answer that?

Mr. MUSKIE. Of course.

Mr. JAVITS. The difference is we cannot buy oil out of the stabilization fund, the stabilization fund totally has already been established, is already in the process of use, and is not a budget fund.

So if we cannot buy oil out of the stabilization fund——

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. Not yet.

If we cannot buy with the stabilization fund, that would be the difference. But we cannot. The only thing we can do with the stabilization fund is engage in operations like the Witteveen facility, or swaps, and so on.

So that is a big, fundamental difference.

It is not just taking money out of the Treasury to buy fungible goods. If we took money out of the Treasury for the purpose of buying foreign currency, of course, we would have to budget it appropriately.

But that is not what Senator STEVENSON is arguing. He is arguing that we are taking money out of the fund, which is established, operating outside the budget process for this very purpose.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. STEVENSON. Surely.

Mr. McCLURE. I think the stabilization fund is clearly outside the budget and it has operated that way since back in the 1930's.

I think that the moneys that are necessary to contribute to the stabilization fund are not covered by the Budget Act.

But that is not what we are dealing with here today. We are dealing with a different amount of money for a different purpose that has not been exempted from the Budget Act. Therefore, the stabilization fund analogy is, by its own terms, inappropriate to apply to this.

Mr. JAVITS. It is not an analogy. It is money. If there is any money, it comes out of the stabilization fund.

That is what the Senator is telling us.

Mr. McCLURE. That is what I am saying it is not.

Mr. JAVITS. Well, it is what he is telling us.

Mr. STEVENSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a memorandum from the Treasury on its accounting for monetary reserves.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACCOUNTING FOR MONETARY RESERVES ON THE BOOKS OF THE UNITED STATES TREASURY AND ITS RELATIONSHIP TO THE APPROPRIATIONS PROCESS

I. THE ACCOUNTING FRAMEWORK

The concepts underlying Treasury accounting for its operating cash and its domestic and international monetary reserves have evolved over such a long period that their roots are lost in history. The logic, however, is evidenced from an examination of the items listed under the caption "Cash and monetary assets" in Treasury financial reports.

The term "cash" in that caption means the same as in commercial accounting practice, i.e., coin and paper currency in the till and demand deposits in banks. It includes not only U.S. dollar currency and deposits but also foreign currency. Cash is essentially synonymous with money—whatever represents the currently usable medium of exchange or means of settling debts.

The term "money" is important to an understanding of the rationale underlying the accounting treatment of monetary reserves. The constitution says that "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law. . . ." This has been interpreted from the beginning of the Federal Government to mean (1) that the spending of any form of money—e.g., to acquire goods and services—requires an appropriation; and (2) that the conversion of money from one form to another—such as the deposit of paper currency into a bank account or the payment of U.S. dollars in exchange for British pounds—does not require an appropriation.

Although Treasury accounting for cash parallels commercial practice as far as that goes, the Treasury accounts extend substantially beyond commercial practice to incorporate the Treasury's role as a governmental monetary authority. The monetary role of the Treasury has evolved from a predominantly domestic monetary orientation to a predominantly international monetary orientation, but throughout the evolution the accounts for domestic and international monetary reserve assets have been intertwined with accounts for Treasury operating cash. With only occasional lapses, both operating cash items and monetary reserve items have been treated as components of Treasury "money," governed by the aforementioned rules regarding appropriations.

II. MONETARY RESERVE ACCOUNTS

Some money items are interchangeable between operating uses and monetary uses, while others are confined primarily to the monetary area of use. They all have the common characteristic, however, of broad acceptability in the settlement of debts or of ready conversion to money items that have such acceptability. In the international area, these settlements may be infrequent and may be confined to government-to-government dealings, but the various means of payment have acceptability by virtue of international agreements or established convention and are recognized in the official accounts of the governments concerned, and of the IMF, as monetary reserve assets. In this connection, a sharp line is drawn between assets that have the characteristics of money and those that do not. The United States has invested many billions in capital contributions to international development institutions and put many more into foreign loans, but none of these assets has the character of money—only those financial assets that are specifically tied to world monetary arrangements, and that have the money characteristics of wide acceptability and high liquidity, are classified as monetary reserves.

Following is a description of the more important accounts representing monetary reserves.

1. Gold and Silver. Going back to the time when both metals were part of the U.S. monetary base, gold and silver bullion acquisitions have been made without appropriations.

2. Base Coinage Metals. As raw materials for minting coins, copper, nickel and alloys have always been purchased without appropriations. For all other purposes, purchases of these same metals require appropriations.

3. Foreign Exchange. Foreign currencies are acquired both for operating needs and purely monetary needs. In either case, they are normally carried as a component of the cash accounts and are acquired without charging appropriations.

4. IMF-Related Monetary Reserves. The following categories of IMF-related monetary reserves have only a monetary use, i.e., can be exchanged for other forms of money, and have no operating use, i.e., cannot be used to purchase goods and services.

A. Special Drawing Rights. The allocation of Special Drawing Rights to the United States as well as U.S. acquisition of Special Drawing Rights are made without appropriations.

B. Reserve Position with the International Monetary Fund. The United States' reserve position in the IMF is comprised of the U.S. "reserve tranche," and claims by the United States on the IMF for financing provided under the GAB and the Witteveen Facility.

(1) "Reserve Tranche": The so-called "reserve tranche," comprised of the U.S. quota in the IMF less the dollars held by the IMF in the form of letters of credit, represents a right to draw foreign currencies from the IMF in the nature of a demand deposit. Although originally financed by appropriation and treated as an expenditure, the account was reclassified in the late 1960's to the "cash and monetary" group of accounts in recognition of the development of its status internationally as a monetary reserve. Treatment of the "reserve tranche" as a monetray reserve is in keeping with the practice followed by the IMF and all IMF members.

(2) General Arrangements to Borrow: Although an appropriation was enacted to finance U.S. participation in the General Arrangements to Borrow, the appropriation was not necessary and was not used when the time came for the U.S. to participate by advancing cash to the IMF. This was a recognition that U.S. financing under the GAB, when called, was in the nature of a demand deposit. It can be readily converted to dollars, SDR or foreign currencies for balance of payments purposes and it is recognized as a monetary reserve by all GAB participants and by the IMF.

(3) Witteveen Facility: The accounting treatment called for by the nature of the assets that would be acquired by the U.S. in providing financing under the Witteveen Facility is the same as that applied to claims on the IMF acquired by the U.S. under the GAB and the U.S. reserve tranche with the IMF. These assets are a part of the U.S. reserve position in the IMF and have the same essential money characteristic—ready conversion into dollars, SDR or foreign currencies for balance of payments purposes. It has an additional liquidity feature in that the claims acquired by the U.S. can be sold, by agreement, to other countries.

III. VALUATION GAINS AND LOSSES

Because the unit of account for Treasury accounting is the U.S. dollar, all money items except U.S. dollars are subject to changes in value when expressed in dollar terms. These value changes, gains and losses, have been accounted for in various specific ways, as outlined in the following paragraphs, but the general result has been invariable: Gains are classified as revenues for credit to a congressionally sanctioned receipt or fund account; losses are classified as expenditures which must be charged to a congressionally sanctioned appropriation or fund account. Generally losses are netted against gains, at least in part, but the arrangements vary in that respect.

1. Gold, Silver and Coinage Metals. These monetary metals in practice have generated only gains. This is because the acquisition cost has always been at or below the then-current statutory monetary value, and dispositions have always been at or above the then-current statutory monetary value. When gold no longer was allowed to be coined, and instead served as a monetary reserve against paper currency, statutory authority was provided for any increase in the official dollar value of gold to be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt; and, an appropriation was provided to cover any decrease in the official dollar value of gold.

2. Foreign Currencies. Gains and losses on foreign currencies are handled in three principal ways.

A. Foreign Currencies Held by Treasury and State Department Disbursing Officers for Disbursement in Behalf of Themselves and Other Agencies. Gains and losses are netted throughout the fiscal year on these foreign currencies, with any overall net gain transferred to miscellaneous receipts. A net loss would be held in suspense until the following year, pending enactment of an appropriation to the Treasury. Appropriations for that purpose are authorized by existing legislation.

B. Foreign Currencies Held by Defense Department Disbursing Officers. Gains and losses are not recognized explicitly because expenditures of the foreign currencies are valued at the average cost of the currencies rather than the prevailing daily market rate. Implicitly, therefore, gains and losses are distributed to Defense Department appropriations.

C. Foreign Currencies Held by the Exchange Stabilization Fund. Gains and losses are netted within the fund without regard to time

3. Special Drawing Rights. SDRs are accounted for as part of the Exchange Stabilization Fund, and gains and losses fall to the fund, with valuation on a monthly basis.

4. U.S. Reserve Position in the IMF. Gains and losses on the U.S. reserve tranche and the GAB are netted, with separate accounts for the reserve tranche and for the GAB. Any net losses would be charged against existing appropriations accounts for the U.S. quota in the IMF and the 1962 appropriation for the GAB. Any realized gains would be covered into miscellaneous receipts. The proposed accounting for gains and losses on the Witteveen Facility is exactly the same as for the existing components of the U.S. reserve position in the IMF. An appropriation would be sought to cover potential net losses, and net gains would be covered into miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, approval by the Congress of S. 2152, the bill to authorize U.S. participation in the Witteveen Facility, is essential to the stability of the international monetary system. The facility is needed to replenish the resources of the International Monetary Fund and enable the Fund to provide medium-term balance-of-payments financing while countries take measures to reduce their deficits.

The Witteveen Facility would provide approximately $10 billion to the International Monetary Fund for a period of not more than 5 years, of which the United States would be committed for about $1.8 billion. At the end of that 5-year period no more funds would be dispersed through the Witteveen Facility although repayments could extend over as much as another 7 years.

This temporary addition to the Fund's resources is necessary to meet serious structural payments problems. As countries felt the oil price increases in 1973 and the consequent slowdown in economic growth and trade, many countries took measures to finance their deficits while maintaining their growth rates. Some countries failed to adopt programs to adjust to the higher cost of oil imports and slower growth of exports.

Instead, they attempted to continue expanding their spending at home and imports from abroad as if nothing had changed.

Private financial institutions are reluctant to provide additional financing for countries not taking steps to realize a better equilibrium in their international payments. Drawings on the International Monetary Fund have been higher over the last 2 years than ever before. Many countries have turned to the International Monetary Fund to meet their payments deficits while they take measures to restore equilibrium. Measures to reduce oil imports and boost exports require time. Countries need to draw larger amounts from the Fund for longer periods of time to balance their payments without adopting drastic trade and payments restrictions.

It is in the interest of the United States to help put the IMF in a position to provide financing subject to appropriate conditionality. Otherwise, there is a grave risk that countries will take measures which could restrict U.S. exports and further weaken the dollar. Indeed, it is even conceivable that national insolvencies could trigger a domino effect in the international banking system, with grave economic consequences for the world.

The Witteveen Facility is a cooperative step by 14 countries to help stabilize the world economy. The participants include the countries with the strongest currencies. OPEC countries will contribute one-half the total facility. The U.S. share is less than 17 percent. That is modest compared to the U.S. share in most international institutions. Indeed, it is small by contrast with the stakes of the United States in the world economy.

The Witteveen Facility is a joint effort by OPEC countries and non-OPEC countries to deal with the weakness of the international economy. All countries other than the United States have indicated their readiness to put the facility into operation. Only the concurrence of the U.S. Congress is needed to do so.

Time is needed to deal with the energy problem and increase supplies and reduce consumption. Time is needed to adjust to the growing export potential of the developing countries and make structural adjustments inside both developed and developing economies. That is why the Witteveen Facility is so important. It provides the opportunity for countries with large payments deficits to make substantial drawings for the medium term from the IMF, if they are prepared to take the necessary economic measures to reduce their deficits.

This facility is needed to inspire confidence; confidence in the continuity of international economic cooperation; confidence that the United States and the other major powers, including the OPEC surplus countries, are willing and able to assist other countries to cope with their economic difficulties; confidence that the United States intends to exercise monetary leadership in the world and not retreat within a shell of self-doubt and indecision.

If the United States turns its back on this facility or attaches conditions to its participation which are noxious to the notion of a global international monetary system, there is no chance that there will be another facility like this or that the IMF can continue to play a central role in the international economy. Countries are no longer so dependent upon the United States that they have no alternatives. The United States negotiated a financial support fund in the OECD but, although it was approved by all the other countries, the United States refused to put up its share of the money. The United States pressed for increased international development assistance and promised larger capital contributions to the international development agencies so the poor of the world could have a better future. Now the U.S. Congress refuses to approve payment of the full U.S. share.

The international trade negotiations which the United States pressed to initiate at Tokyo in 1974 continue toward what we all hope will be a successful conclusion. But pressure for protectionist measures are mounting at home, and the United States is moving to place more and more political controls on its exports and investments in other countries.

So, Mr. President, this bill gives us a chance to strike a blow for American authority in the world. It is needed to maintain the economy of the world and, therefore, the political stability of the world.

Mr. President, the world faces a risk of declining trade and general recession. The Witteveen Facility is not the whole answer to that risk, but it is an essential part of the answer.

If world trade can expand and countries realize satisfactory rates of economic growth without inflation, debts and deficits will fade away. This facility can help.

U.S. participation in this facility will cost nothing. In fact, the United States will probably make money by earning interest on this participation. When the facility is liquidated, the United States will show a profit, unless the value of the dollar increases so much in the interim that the exchange rate shift eliminates that profit. We should look forward to such a happy circumstance.

Finally, Mr. President, this debate still fails to distinguish between participation in the IMF and what happens if there is a loss as a result of that participation.

I was not drawing an analogy to the exchange stabilization fund. I was simply pointing out that any losses would come out of the exchange stabilization fund. Participation itself involves an exchange. Congress recognized as much in 1976, which was the first and the only time it has acted on this question, I believe, since enactment of the Budget Act. It recognized what every other country has recognized, that participation involves an exchange of currencies for SDR's. SDR's at the present time are valuable, perhaps more so than the dollar—SDR's which are fully negotiable. They have all the attributes of currency. Participation really has the attributes of a deposit in a bank, for which it never has been suggested that appropriations are required.

Exchange itself does not bring about a loss or a gain. But a loss could occur; and if it did, the loss would be covered out of the exchange stabilization fund, just as losses for exchange rate interventions are covered out of the exchange stabilization fund.

Congress, in its wisdom, as the distinguished junior Senator from Idaho has recognized, does not require appropriations for expenditures from the ESF. That fund has a balance of about $4 billion at the moment. The largest loss that could conceivably be incurred as a result of participation in the Witteveen Facility is $200 million—very easily—should that most unlikely event occur, to be covered out of the ESF.

So even should that unlikely event take place; namely, a loss as a result of a great appreciation in the dollar—it would not be covered by an appropriation; because, as in the case of exchange rate interventions, it would be covered under the ESF, for which Congress does not require appropriations.

Mr. President, for all those reasons, I urge the Senate to approve this legislation and to do so without crippling amendments, without running the risk of politicizing the monetary system of the world, recognizing that, in this world at least, more than one can play that game.

In fact, now, for the first time, the United States, which gave birth to this institution, is no longer its largest contributor. In this case, Saudi Arabia would contribute about 25 percent. The United States would contribute 17 percent.

If the United States, through appropriations requirements or other requirements with political overtones, begins that process, more than one country can play it—with grave economic consequences for a world that requires a stronger, not weaker, monetary system, and with greater political consequences for ourselves and for countries that are friendly to us.

I yield the floor.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, in the last 5 years, the world has been traumatized by major economic disturbances highlighted by staggering oil price increases, unprecedented inflation, and deep and lasting recession. These disturbances have dramatically altered the pattern of world payments and have resulted in large demands being placed upon the international financial system.

The OPEC nations, which traditionally had maintained nearly balanced current-account positions, accumulated surpluses of about $150 billion between 1973 and 1976. Meanwhile, many of the industrial nations, which traditionally had experienced moderate surpluses and had been lenders of capital, suddenly found themselves running sizable deficits and becoming borrowers of capital. During the same period, these nations suffered cumulative current-amount deficits of about $66 billion.

The non-oil-exporting-developing nations, though, were the most severely impacted. Historically, these nations had maintained carefully controlled and, for the most part, manageable current-account deficits which between 1971 and 1973 averaged about $4 billion. However, between 1974 and 1976, this figure rose sixfold to about $23 billion per year.

These large current-account deficits greatly increased the need for balance-of-payment financing, as initial emphasis was placed upon "financing" deficits rather than on "adjusting" economies for the purpose of eliminating or reducing deficits. Nations were encouraged by international agencies, including the IMF, to finance their deficits in the short run to deter individual nations from implementing painful internal measures and/or self-serving, protectionist measures to support their payments positions.

Though the bulk of this financing has been provided by the private markets (about 75 percent), official financing has also increased substantially during this period. As a result of this demand, the IMF's holdings of usable currencies, even with the recent sixth quota increase, are extremely low and judged to be inadequate to support the potential needs of its members.

This judgment is based upon the premise that the large payment imbalances will continue for several years and that there will be a growing need for some nations to shift their emphasis from simply financing deficits to "adjusting" their economies to resolve deep-rooted structural economic problems.

The supplementary financing facility would add about $10.5 billion to the IMF's resources to be used specifically to assist nations with severe balance-of-payments problems. Many of these nations, given their financing needs and internal economic problems, no longer have access to the private markets. For them, economic adjustment programs, requiring adequate financial support, are essential before their situations become critical.

The IMF is the appropriate vehicle to provide such support. It is the primary source of official balance-of-payment financing and is experienced in working with countries to develop sound and internationally responsible economic adjustment programs.

Furthermore, because the IMF is an international institution whose only direct interest is in maintaining order in the international monetary system and where decisions are based solely on economic criteria, borrowing members are more likely and willing to accept conditions imposed by the Fund than they are those imposed by other governments or private financial institutions. In fact, IMF conditions are often welcomed by governments as they provide justification for imposing politically difficult but necessary adjustment measures.

Specifically, the facility would make financing available to needy members in larger amounts and for longer periods than currently available under IMF credit tranches to support carefully developed and economically appropriate adjustment programs. These programs are designed to reduce the borrowers' needs for external financing and to put their balance of payments on a more sustainable basis.

The countries that are most likely to benefit from this facility are the weaker, low-income developed countries and the more advanced less developed countries. Potential users of this facility include: Portugal, Turkey, Peru, Egypt, Bolivia, Zaire, to name a few, all of whom have been experiencing serious payments imbalances. Obviously, it is not possible to tell whether any of these nations will ever actually draw upon the facility or to foresee which other nations may need to use it. It is interesting to note, however, that the countries mentioned as possible users include, in addition to trading partners, nations of significant strategic importance in sensitive areas of the world. It would be damaging to our national interest to allow instability to foster in these nations.

Fourteen countries have already made pledges to participate in the facility. These participants include seven industrial and seven oil-exporting nations with each group providing approximately one-half of the funds. We, the United States, would not be the largest contributor, for a change. Saudi Arabia would have that distinction by providing about 24 percent or $2.5 billion to the facility. Our share would be about 17 percent or $1.8 billion. The facility has been designed in such a manner, though, that it cannot be implemented without U.S. commitment. Therefore, what we do here today will decide the fate of this important facility.

Though the facility is relatively small in comparison with the magnitude of the problem, it should assist in an overall strengthening of the international monetary system by improving the economic stability and thus the creditworthiness of members adopting adjustment programs, and by encouraging the adjustment of balance-of-payment positions toward a more sustainable pattern.

Considering our dependence on the international monetary system, which is the basis for world trade and financial flows, the United States is obviously going to benefit substantially from a stabilizing and strengthening of this system. We are the world's largest trader, with exports and imports totaling about $270 billion last year, and our money markets are of international importance and scope. Furthermore, the dollar is the international medium of exchange, serving as the world's reserve currency. Consequently, the interdependence of our economy with those of other nations and our position in the world's economy makes it vitally important for us to promote, to the extent possible, a stable and viable international monetary system.

Passage of this bill will, therefore, not only state our commitment to the IMF supplementary financing facility but it will also do our part, to further a sound and expanding world ecomony which is in our own interest as well. I thus urge my colleagues to support this important legislation.

I would only add, Mr. President, that if we fail to pass this important piece of legislation or if we burden it with amendments that will result either in politicizing the Fund or making our participation in the facility unacceptable to other Members, as I think we are in some jeopardy of doing, we stand the danger of losing our credibility as a leader in the international economic affairs of the world, and that would seriously jeopardize the stability of the international monetary system.

We chose awhile back not to participate in the $25 billion OECD safety net and now we have taken almost a year to act on our pledge to this facility while the other 13 participants have anxiously awaited our decision, having already committed themselves.

Mr. President, surely we should not do any more than we already have to create further doubts about the stability of our Government, the continued role of the dollar as an international medium of exchange and our ability to sustain a leadership position in world affairs.

People have expressed some doubts openly abroad about our ability to meet these objectives. Our failure to act in a positive manner on this bill will only cause a further deterioration in confidence abroad in our ability as a nation and our willingness as a people to exert the leadership the rest of the world expects and hopes that we can provide.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I shall not take over 5 minutes. We want to get on with the bill and deal with the amendments.

I would like to say, first of all, that before going into my opening statement, which will be brief, that the only reason I raised and took issue with my colleagues respecting this budget process is the practical issue of its reaching out into many areas which do represent banking transactions by the United States which require immediate action such as, for example, the support of currencies like our own.

We ourselves have drawn on the International Monetary Fund not once but on previous occasions, and we are now facing a very unstable international condition in currencies, including a most drastic fall of the dollar which may very well require that we use the facility again.

I did not wish to immobilize the United States any more, Mr. Presdent, than I did, and I beg my colleagues to hear me on this, any more than I did want to in the War Powers Act, with which I had so much to do. I do not wish to immobilize our President in an immediate response if the national security of the country required it. Indeed, that act does not in any way restrain him on that very critical point.

I feel the same way about this, and, hence, that is why we are debating this issue because we do not want the reach of immobilization to paralyze us when action is urgently required.

I have no doctrinaire views about this particular matter. If the Appropriations Committee—I say to all my colleagues who are interested in that phase of the Congressional process—does not like this they can kill it anyhow because they have to vote the $200 million worth of the appropriations.

So I wish to make that explanation.

Mr. President, as to the desirability of what we are doing, to me it is, perhaps, of even more importance than it is to the International Monetary Fund or to the parties which look at it solely as the Witteveen Facility. This is because, Mr. President, since last August when I first testified before the Banking Committee, I am convinced that the crisis—and it is a crisis which is getting worse in the international monetary situation which results from the quadrupling, the quintupling, almost, in the price of oil and the resulting strain on the less developed countries, which are now borrowing up to their ears, rolling over their borrowings with commercial banks, and threatens the world with a recession or a serious depression.

Now, the only way you can handle that, because these less developed countries cannot keep up these borrowings—Mr. President—is by expanding the world's production and the world's consumption, and this can only be done if we are bold enough to extend the kind of credit, on intelligent bases, which is only extended in war. We are scared to death of $100 billion, but we thought nothing of it, of expanding our debt by $100 billion in each year of World War II, and that was in those dollars which mean $200 billion or more today. That was for war. But have we ever done it for peace? The answer is, no, except the Marshall Plan. That is the time we really showed that kind of boldness and enterprise.

The Witteveen Facility, Mr. President, is a recognition of the way in which the world should move if it wishes to save itself from a monetary and a financial debacle. That is why, Mr. President, taking the larger picture into consideration, although the facility is for the adjustment of balances of payments problem, is a first step in the direction of the world's realizing and meeting this peril.

Secondly, it is a banking matter, and I am so deeply indebted to Senator STEVENSON for making that clear, that we are going to be repaid as if it were a banking loan.

As we know from oil, with British oil and North Slope oil and oil being discovered in the less-developed countries where we never dreamed it might exist, the resources of this world are far beyond our calculations. But the ingenuity of man must draw them out, and I have the greatest respect for my conservative friends, if they would think this way about governmental program as they do for private business.

I hope, therefore—and we will get over this particular hurdle in some way, I assure Senator MCCLURE—I hope all my Colleagues will look at this Witteveen Facility from the point of view of that kind of enterprise.

Other than that, whatever may be our arguments about our internal action, it is a very hardheaded banking deal with people who want to deal with us.

I hope very much, Mr. President, that as we debate this issue we will keep our eye on the ball and on the main theme, which is why I have been so deeply devoted to this particular effort which we have here.

The United States was a primary force behind the establishment of Witteveen Facility, which totals approximately $10.5 billion; yet, we are the only country which has not completed its constitutional procedures for participation. In its negotiations with the other donor countries in the IMF, the administration took into account congressional concerns about an earlier attempt made by the Ford administration to develop a program to meet the balance of payments needs of the world, the OECD safety net.

In response to congressional criticism of the safety net that it did not include money from the OPEC countries and would not be used to meet the balance of payments needs of the developing countries, the administration favored a facility within the IMF which specifically met our concerns.

Let it be clear to my colleagues that we are not talking about a foreign aid program. The IMF is the world's central monetary institution and serves as a common storehouse of international monetary reserves to which all the members of the IMF have contributed. The member countries thus are eligible to draw upon the reserves for official ballance of payments financing which must be accompanied by steps to stabilize their economies and correct any excessive deficit in the balance of payments. Once a country has been accepted for membership and has paid its entrance fees by contributing hard currencies, gold, and some of its local currency, it has the right to draw on its share in IMF resources to which it is entitled.

All IMF members contribute to the reserve pool; and nearly every member, including the United States, has drawn a portion of its reserve quota to meet balance of payments needs at one time or another. The United States, in fact, has drawn on 23 occasions in the amount of $3.5 billion.

The Witteveen Facility is specifically geared to meeting the needs of the international economy for increased flows of capital from countries in balance-of-payments surplus to those in deficit. Increased flows are, however, not enough. The international economy has suffered greatly since the quadrupling of oil prices by the OPEC countries in 1973–1974, and we need further to insure that the increased capital flows are put to productive use in capital investment in order to generate the needed funds to pay for the increased energy costs that these countries are incurring.

In the light of this cataclysmic shock that has severely affected the world economy, it is imperative that the international institutions that were created to deal with balance-of-payments problems adapt their programs to meet these changed conditions. In the immediate period following the OPEC price rise, the commercial banking system rose to the occasion by recycling much of the funds from the surplus to the deficit countries. The fact that the international monetary system did not collapse, as was predicted by many in the immediate aftermath of the 1973–74 OPEC price rise, was due to the resiliency of the private commercial banking sector.

The official institutions, responded, too, albeit more slowly. The Witteven Facility is part of that official response. The other official institutions—the World Bank and the regional development banks—have only begun now to increase their lending to the deficit countries.

The Witteveen Facility is needed in order to permit the IMF to meet these increased world balance-of-payments financing needs and to promote economic stabilization for member countries in this period of particular financial difficulty and uncertainty. The facility will total approximately $10.5 billion, with OPEC countries sharing in the financing on a roughly 50–50 basis with the major industrial countries. Saudi Arabia is the largest participant, providing about 24 percent of the financing. The U.S. share, about 17 percent, is appropriate to our large stake in a healthy world economy. This financing involves no net interest cost to the Treasury and gives us a highly liquid asset—for each dollar we provide, we receive an equivalent increase in our international monetary reserves which we can encash in the event of balance-of-payments need.

We have heard much criticism of the IMF because of the conditions that the IMF insists upon, the so-called "conditionality," in order to permit countries to draw upon IMF resources. It is often argued that these corrective actions are much too harsh and that they impose severe restrictions on the economies of the borrowing countries. This issue has been explored in depth. I ask unanimous consent that a recent speech given by the former Managing Director of the Fund, Johannes Witteveen, who negotiated the Facility and for whom it is named, be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FUND'S CONDITIONAL ASSISTANCE PROMOTES ADJUSTMENT PROGRAMS OF MEMBERS, WITTEVEEN STATES

The financial activities of the Fund do not relate exclusively to developing countries, but these countries do form the vast majority of the number of countries borrowing from the Fund. As is well known, the current account deficits of the non-oil producing developing countries increased sharply after the quadrupling of oil prices in late 1973 and 1974. At the same time, relatively new channels of financing emerged—in particular, private commercial banks have made a substantial contribution to financing payments imbalances in the years since 1973. Nevertheless, the Fund also has had to play a more important role than previously in financing these deficits. At an annual average of about $29 billion, the current account deficits of non-oil producing developing countries were somewhat over three times as large in 1974–77 as during 1968–73; as between the same two periods, the share of assistance provided by the Fund increased from 3 per cent to 6 per cent. This latter percentage may appear to be small and is indeed much smaller than that attributable to commercial banks. However, the balance of payments assistance provided by the Fund plays a crucial role in the international credit system principally because of its most distinctive feature—the conditionality attached to it.

Over the past four and a half years that I have been at the Fund, I have become increasingly aware of the critical role played by conditionality in the contribution that the Fund makes to alleviating the balance of payments problems of countries and to facilitating the international adjustment process. The Fund's conditionality is often viewed as a quid pro quo for its financial assistance. I submit that such a view is in error. The Fund's conditionality is, in fact, an essential complement to the assistance it provides. Without the conditionality, the financial assistance cannot be used to its maximum potential advantage, while, without the assistance, the process of adjustment would be much more painful.

Conditionality consists of the requirement that a country making use of the fund's resources do so in the framework of an economic policy program aimed at restoring equilibrium in its payments position. It is based on the simple premise that in most cases it is unwise and, in the end, not even feasible, to finance balance of payments deficits over a protracted period of time without taking corrective measures. I must stress, however, that there are circumstances in which less emphasis need be placed on adjustment, and this the fund fully recognizes. Balance of payments disequilibria of a relatively small magnitude are a case in point—a case that has been accommodated by the liberal policy, in existence since 1955, relating to the use of the Fund's resources that does not go beyond the first credit tranche. Payments difficulties caused by downward fluctuations in export earnings which arise from circumstances substantially beyond the control of a country and which can be expected with reasonable confidence to be reversed in a relatively short period of time are another case in point. The Fund has accommodated this case by introducing in 1963 a special facility [the compensatory financing facility] to finance such needs with minimal conditionality. A third case in point—and the most dramatic—was that arising from the oil price developments of 1973–74. The Fund then considered that the payments deficits resulting from these developments had to be sustained and financed for a while, in order to avoid reinforcing the recessionary forces in the world economy. The oil facilities [for 1974 and 1975] with their limited conditionality were therefore set up.

Apart from these special cases, the dominant feature of all other Fund lending is the degree of conditionality that is attached to it. Except for a brief period of a few years after the Fund opened its doors, it has never been seriously argued that access to the Fund's resources should in general be automatic or even near-automatic. A number of transactions did take place in that brief period, but thereafter the concept of conditionality was explicitly, albeit gradually, introduced into Fund lending policies. There was uncertainty at first as to what the conditionality should consist of, but by early 1952, thinking had so crystallized that the Executive Board could concur in a declaration that the Fund's attitude toward a member country seeking its assistance would be determined above all by its judgment as to whether the policies being pursued by the country were adequate to overcome its balance of payments problem within a temporary period and enable it to reverse drawings from the Fund within an outside range of three to five years.

Along with the basic concept of conditionality, the Fund developed the stand-by arrangement as the channel through which its resources would be made available by the late 1950s, it had become the principal channel for this purpose. The stand-by arrangement was developed initially to assure the availability of Fund resources to countries which did not need such resources immediately but felt that they might need them in the near future. Over time, however, it became clear that the arrangement could in fact also serve as an extremely efficacious instrument for the implementation of conditionality in the case of countries experiencing an immediate as well as a prospective need for balance of payments financing. During the period of the stand-by arrangement, the Fund and the country concerned can work closely together in dealing with the payments problem. Precise declarations by the country as to the policies it intends to follow for this purpose are set out in a letter of intent that accompanies the stand-by arrangement. Actual use of resources made available under the stand-by arrangement is phased over the duration of the arrangement and coordinated with the continued pursuit of corrective policies. Moreover, use of the resources beyond the first credit tranche is contingent on the observance of performance criteria, most of which relate to precisely defined statistical measures of broad aggregates of key economic variables.

So much for the apparatus of Fund lending through which conditionality is implemented. But what is its content? I have said before that conditionality consists of the requirement that a country making use of the Fund's resources do so in the framework of an economic policy program aimed at adjusting its payments position. Clearly, the specifics of such programs will vary depending on factors such as the causes and the severity of the payments problem and the structure and institutional framework of the country's economy. While, therefore, no two programs will look quite the same, there are some common desiderata: the payments objective should not be achieved by tightening restrictions on foreign trade or payments—indeed, elimination of any newly introduced restrictions and, if possible, the reduction of the more long-standing ones should be sought; nor should it be achieved by merely depressing domestic demand temporary without providing for a redirection of resources to the foreign trade sector; nor, finally, should it be achieved by resorting to foreign borrowing on a scale and in a form that may not be sustainable in the medium term. The rationale of these essentials hardly needs elaboration. Improvement in the payments position achieved by any of the above means cannot be enduring.

Given these desiderata, the broad objective of corrective programs is twofold. First, recognizing that balance of payments problems often reflect national overspending, the programs seek to ensure that aggregate demand for goods and services is brought into line with output. For regulating aggregate demand, the appropriate amount of domestic credit expansion is determined in the light of the likely increase in aggregate output during the program period, the price and balance of payments targets, and an assessment of the likely demand for money. Limiting credit expansion to an amount that is compatible with the targets usually involves adjustments in government budgetary policy since bank-financed government deficits are often a primary cause of excessive credit expansion. In a number of cases this kind of demand restraint, taken by itself, would cause a reduction in growth and an increase in unemployment. In such cases, therefore, the program will also have to emphasize the establishment of an appropriate structure of relative prices—a structure that would encourage savings and investment and a redirection of investment as needed for the purpose of strengthening the international competitiveness of the foreign trade sector of the economy. The prices that are most often relevant to the adjustment program are the exchange rate, interest rates, and producer prices of certain key commodities.

The performance criteria in programs supported by the Fund usually relate to the broadest possible economic aggregates that would suffice for the achievement of the objective of payments adjustment. The Fund avoids taking a view on the appropriate distribution of the burden of adjustment as between various sections of society. Thus, for example, if an improvement in the government budgetary position is an ingredient of the program, as is very frequently the case, the performance criterion usually applied relates to the extension of bank credit to the government, rather than to specific measures to increase revenues or cut expenditures. Similarly, performance criteria do not relate to specific prices for individual commodities but, where needed, apply to prices fundamentally influencing the structure of production like exchange rates and interest rates.

I have given you only the barest outline of the content of conditionality. But I have said enough, I think, to indicate why it should have become a subject of controversy. After all, control of inflation and the effectiveness of monetary policy, or the responsiveness of savings to interest rate changes, the efficacy of exchange rate changes in inducing changes in trade flows, and the responsiveness of farmers to price incentives—these have been lively subjects of debate among economists for decades. But what gives a particularly sharp edge to the controversy surrounding conditionality is that the manner in which these issues are resolved bears on the real income of one or another economic group. This goes to the heart of national policies in all countries. Both inflation and balance of payments difficulties reflect efforts on the part of a society, seen as a whole, to avail itself of more resources than it can currently generate. Dealing with these problems involves, especially in the short run, cutting back on real incomes and the use of resources; and fears on the part of each section of society that it may have to assume a disproportionate share of the burden of this cutback provoke strong resistance to efforts aimed at this objective. It is not difficult to see why such matters should become highly charged political issues.

Controversy surrounding these issues and, therefore, surrounding Fund conditionality has increased in intensity in recent years. As I said a while ago, when the oil price developments of late 1973 and early 1974 resulted in large-scale payments disequilibria, the Fund took the view that in dealing with these disequilibria, the emphasis should initially be on financing them. As the dangers of a financial collapse and severe depression receded while the danger of rapid inflation reemerged, the Fund shifted to the view, by the fall of 1976, that the time had come to put greater emphasis on the adjustment of external positions. However, the very scale of the disequilibria meant that in many individual cases the required adjustment was large. The persistence of high unemployment in a number of countries complicated the problem of demand management. Moreover, to the extent that the payments problems were the result of a sharp deterioration in the terms of trade, with a consequent reduction in real income, the necessary domestic adjustment was particularly painful. Finally, the problem was exacerbated in some parts of the world by an increase in the number of governments whose position was insufficiently strong to enable them to undertake difficult adjustment measures.

In the remainder of my remarks today, I shall try to respond to some of the criticisms, both new and old, that are leveled against the policy stance that underlies Fund conditionality. If we in the Fund attach as much importance to conditionality as I have said we do, we are conscience-bound to be constantly on our guard to ensure that its broad philosophy continues to be rational, realistic, and, most important, relevant to individual country situations. We can do so only by utilizing the continuously accumulating lessons of experience and heeding the constructive criticism that outsiders—whether in national governments, international banks, academia or the press—may have to offer. It is, therefore, in a spirit of a dialogue with those who are concerned to achieve the same broad objectives as those of the Fund that I make my remarks.

One criticism is that Fund conditionality, with its emphasis on the role of demand restraint in dealing with payments problems, always compromises the growth objective unduly and is particularly inappropriate in the context of the current world economic situation which calls for more expansionary policies. I must state at once that I share the concern with the current world economic situation which in part motivates this criticism. Unfortunately, substantial underutilization of capacity, very high levels of unemployment, low rates of investment, and increasing reliance on protectionist trade measures are too widely prevalent today, and there is clearly a need now for greater emphasis on policies to stimulate economic growth. However, such stimulatory policies cannot be undertaken indiscriminately. They will not be successful and could indeed be severely damaging if undertaken without regard to the price situation in each country and the relative position of that country in the international adjustment process. I have emphasized in other forums and I would like to emphasize here once again that countries with strong balance of payments positions and relatively stable domestic price situations, whether developed or developing, must contribute more vigorously to world economic growth than a number of them are doing at present. But for countries with persistent domestic inflation and large balance of payments deficits, expansionary policies are not appropriate, even in the present world situation. They must give priority to bringing inflation under control and reducing their payments deficits to manageable proportions. In doing so, growth may appear temporarily to be sacrificed. However, if an appropriately restrained demand policy is combined with a realistic price structure, as I have already indicated, adjustment can go together with, and even lead to, stronger and healthier growth. Moreover, in an uncomfortably large number of countries evidence is strong that growth does not proceed beyond a modest rate until inflation has been substantially reduced and balance of payments constraints eased.

Progress toward these respective objectives in surplus and deficit countries will be mutually supportive and must go hand in hand. Progress by countries with low inflation and strong payments positions will ease the process of adjustment in those with high inflation and weak payments positions. And, progress by the latter toward their immediate objective will make their eventual contribution to the growth of the world economy more sustainable.

Let me turn now to a criticism of Fund conditionality which is independent of the current world economic situation. This is that policy recommendations made by the Fund are based on a faith in the working of the price mechanism as an allocator of resources, a faith that is not justified, especially in the developing economies with their narrow production base and shortages of essential factors of production. It is also sometimes suggested the policies based on the use of the price mechanism are regressive in their incidence.

It will clearly be impossible for me to deal fully with this subject within the confines of this speech. I shall, therefore, deal with it only selectively. I shall first make a general remark and then address two matters that are of specific concern to critics in this area.

My general remark is this. There is probably truth in the argument that because of market imperfections of various kinds, the price mechanism does not always function in the most ideal manner. However, reliance on detailed physical controls for the allocation of resources is not a clearly preferable alternative, since it presupposes that the administrative machinery possesses a degree of efficiency, knowledge, and foresight that obtains in few countries. In fact, this has come to be increasingly appreciated, and consequently we now see an unmistakable trend throughout the world to reduce reliance on controls and make greater use of realistic pricing. It is also recognized more clearly that, even where reliance on controls is substantial, relative prices that reflect market conditions facilitate the task of those who administer the controls.

Besides, a pervasive system of controls all too frequently opens up possibilities of corruption. Surely, this is not a desirable consequence, especially in societies in which a highly unequal distribution of income creates tensions which are exacerbated by resentment of the fact that corruption creates considerable wealth among those who wield political or economic power.

An area of particular concern to some critics is the exchange rate. It is often argued that the Fund recommend exchange rate changes much too readily. According to this view, a devaluation, instead of facilitating the task of coping with payments imbalances, in fact makes it more difficult, because it has an immedate domestic inflationary impact, while the supply response, which is necessary in order to achieve the desired export expansion and import substitution, takes a long time to materialize. What is needed to improve the balance of payments, the argument continues, is a host of direct measures aimed at increasing domestic production, rather than the relative price changes attendant on a devaluation. It is also argued that devaluation is too blunt an instrument and does not permit enough selectivity in the control of imports.

It is true that Fund-supported programs intended to cope with large payments deficits often include action in the exchange rate field. Indeed, under the amended Articles of Agreement as recently adopted, it is one of the obligations of all Fund member countries to ensure that exchange rates are not set at levels that would impede effective balance of payments adjustment, and the Fund is required to oversee the observance by each member of its obligations. When domestic prices and costs become substantially out of line with those in trade partner or competitor countries, development of the foreign trade sector is stifled. If that sector is to be revitalized, an exchange rate change is surely the simplest and the least painful of the available policy alternatives, although it must be accompanied by a policy of adequate demand restraint. The alternative of domestic deflation alone is far more costly in terms of output and employment. The alternative of restrictions on trade and payments may hold down imports but does little to encourage exports; indeed, it serves to discourage them insofar as it raises the input costs of exporters without increasing their returns. Attempts to overcome this difficulty by subsidizing exports, together with the initial restrictions on imports, result in time in an excessively complex system of controls and subsidies which is cumbersome and distorts incentives toward obtaining administrative favors rather than developing markets, improving products, or reducing costs. It may well be that the response of export supplies to price incentives set up by a devaluation takes some time, but there is little reason to expect it to take more time than the response to export subsidies.

Once it is accepted that sustainable development of an economy requires the healthy development of its foreign trade sector, it becomes apparent that realistic pricing of foreign exchange should be viewed not merely as an instrument for balancing the external accounts but, in fact, as a powerful instrument of development policy. Moreover, a realistic exchange rate by appropriately pricing capital goods which developing countries for the most part import, encourages the substtiution of labor for capital and thus helps in the efforts to promote employment—one of the most important policy objectives of developing countries.

What I have been saying is amply grounded in the experience of many countries. I am not at all suggesting, of course, that exchange rate policy alone is a panacea for all balance of payments or development problems. For it to be fully effective, complementary policies are needed not only in the area of demand management but also in broad areas having to do with the improvement of productive efficiency.

I would like to cite another instance of the importance of relative prices. In a period of inflation, the authorities often feel compelled to keep prices of basic food items stable in the interests of low income consumers in urban areas. Sometimes this is done by subsidizing the consumer through the government budget; the Fund points out the budgetary problems such subsidies could create but accepts their continuation if they are an important part of the social program of the government and it is clearly understood that the burden of such a subsidy has to be borne by some section of society. Just as often, however, the low consumer prices are made possible by the payment of low prices to producers of basic foods, who are themselves among the poorest sections of society. Experience has shown, moreover, that in a period in which other prices are rising, such low prices serve as a strong disincentive to the production of basic items, and producers tend to shift to the production of other, higher-priced items. The problem cannot be solved, as many governments try to do, by subsidizing the price of inputs necessary for food production, for that is not an efficient substitute for the appropriate pricing of output. Thus, a policy designed to protect the interest of the lower income consumers often turns out, in fact, to affect them adversely.

Let us turn next to the argument that while the sort of corrective measures that the Fund recommends may be appropriate, the pace of adjustment that the Fund looks for is too rapid. It is argued that such an excessively rapid pace risks political recoil, a possible reversal of the measures and, eventually, greater economic damage. I should point out in this connection that all too many countries approach the Fund for financial assistance only when, as a result of protracted delay in taking corrective action, the economic situation has already become critical. Under such circumstances, it is inevitable that at least the initial corrective measures would be painful. Also, in the Fund's experience, a gradual approach to taking corrective measures has not always proved to be preferable to bold, decisive action. Indeed, gradualism can actually give vested interests an opportunity to reassert themselves, pushing the economy back into its previous difficulties.

The Fund recognizes, however, that a corrective program spread over a period longer than the one year which has been the standard for stand-by arrangements has certain advantages. Such a longer period could make it possible for the authorities to choose from a broader range of alternative policy instruments, permitting a more acceptable distribution of the burden between various sections of society; it could also give them greater latitude in determining the timing of various measures. The authorities may feel that a longer-term program promises greater political assurance of steady progress toward the intended goals. In recognition of this possibility, the Fund has been modifying its practices. The initial adaptation, used already for some years, was to have successive annual stand-by arrangements with a given country; but more recently, the Fund has introduced a few two-year stand-by arrangements.

The extended Fund facility established in 1974 also meets the need for adjustment measures spread over a period of time longer than one year. Programs under this facility, which are for relatively large amounts, can be for periods of up to three years. Such long-term programs are particularly appropriate when fundamental policy and institutional reforms are needed and it is necessary to coordinate medium-term investment plans with financial policies. Each of the extended arrangements so far agreed has been for a three-year period.

Countries have sometimes considered it anomalous and perhaps also unfair that they should have to negotiate a wide range of national policies with the Fund when the amount of financing the Fund can provide is a small proportion of their need for balance of payments financing. It is recognized, of course, that agreement with the Fund is often a precondition for other financing to be made available. Nevertheless, it has become increasingly common for countries to perceive the Fund as the lender of last resort, approaching it only when all other sources are exhausted and the economic situation has, in the meanwhile, greatly deteriorated. As I have said earlier, much of the difficulty associated with Fund conditionality arises from the severity of the adjustment measures needed at that late stage. The new supplementary financing facility is, therefore, designed to enable the Fund to meet more fully the needs of countries whose payments deficits are large in relation to their quotas.

I would hope that countries would increasingly recognize the desirability of approaching the Fund in the early stages of their balance of payments problems. In this context, let me recall for a moment what I described earlier as the initial conception of the stand-by arrangement. The stand-by arrangement was initially conceived as a sort of precautionary device to assure the availability of financing to countries that did not have an immediate need for such financing but felt that they might need it in the near future. In the evolution of the stand-by arrangement over time, we have largely lost sight of this initial purpose. I think countries must once again begin to look upon the stand-by arrangement as a line of credit to be arranged before a large-scale or urgent need for financing is actually upon them. Our friends in the press can help in this respect by not always portraying such occasions as situations of crisis or confrontation.

More fundamentally, it is necessary to counter the belief that Fund conditionally involves policy measures that countries in balance of payments difficulties could otherwise do without. There are circumstances in which balance of payments deficits can and should be financed. There are periods, relatively brief, over which they can be financed—whether or not they should be. But certainly no country can use reserves or borrow indefinitely to finance sizable overall payments deficits. Sooner or later, the time to finance comes to an end and the time to adjust arrives, simply because no source of financing is available. The adjustment measures which then become unavoidable are unlikely to be very different from those that are encompassed by Fund conditionally. Indeed, even when supported by the Fund, a country's adjustment program is likely to be successful only if the government itself clearly perceives that the adjustment is needed and is completely committed to seeing it through to its successful conclusion. For that national will and commitment, Fund conditionality is not a substitute. The fund can counsel and agree but it assuredly cannot—as is, unfortunately, so often said—"impose" policies and conditions.

I have just said that the Fund counsels on national economic policy making. Over the past 25 years, the staff of the Fund has developed a considerable body of economic and financial technology that has been tested in the crucible of practical experience in many countries at differing stages of development and facing a wide variety of problems. This technical expertise relates to a variety of areas such as trade and payments policies, policies relating to taxation, tax administration and budgetary control, and monetary policies and institutions. The sharing of this accumulated experience is an important service that the staff provides to national authorities, not only in the process of collaboration that is involved in designing the balance of payments adjustments programs supported financially by the Fund but also on a more continuing basis.

Since one of the purposes of the Fund is to help achieve a balanced development of the world economy, it must promote at the national level the careful balance between financing and adjustment which I have been talking about. In other words, a successful functioning of the international monetary system requires that the provision of unconditional international liquidity and that of conditional liquidity be suitably harmonized. By promoting adjustment in this way the Fund in fact provides a crucial underpinning to the whole structure of international credit. This seems to me an increasingly important contribution to the continued growth of the world economy.

Mr. JAVITS. Let me quote from Mr. Witteveen's speech:

The Fund's conditionality is, in fact, an essential complement to the assistance it provides. Without the conditionality, the financial assistance cannot be used to its maximum potential advantage, while, without the assistance, the process of adjustment would be much more painful.

In analyzing what conditions the Fund must insist upon, it is important for us to remember that the Fund has become a lender of the last resort. Once again I would like to quote from Mr. Witteveen,

It has become increasingly common for countries to perceive the Fund as a lender of the last resort, approaching it only when all other sources are exhausted; and the economic system has, in the meanwhile, greatly deteriorated.

A deteriorated economic system and, hence, balance of payments difficulties, generally are the result of attempts by a member countries design to deal with resources than it can currently generate. The stabilization programs, which the member country to avail itself of more these problems, involve, especially in the short run, cutting back on the aggregate real income and the use of resources by that country. This is a harsh task; but, using a term that has become very popular today and is very apposite, "There is no such thing as a free lunch."

This past week there appeared in the Washington Post a series of articles on the IMF. I ask unanimous consent that they be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 23, 1978]

NOW, WHEN THE IMF TALKS, MORE NATIONS ARE LISTENING

(By Art Pine)

Last February, a four-member field team was quietly sent from the International Monetary Fund to the Zambian capital, Lusaka, for discreet negotiations. The subject: the Zambian government's request for a $305 million emergency loan to save the country's credit by underwriting its heavy balance-of-payments deficit.

After 21 days of delicate discussions, Zambia had its money. But in return, Prime Minister Kenneth Kaunda had to promise to devalue his country's currency and slash government spending. The devaluation meant higher prices for imports, and the spending cuts meant reductions in income. The two actions lowered the Zambian standard of living, but the government had no choice. It was either accept the IMF's conditions or go bankrupt.

What occurred isn't unusual, but it serves to illustrate a point. The fund, a 130-nation organization whose job is to police the badly strained world monetary system, is gaining increased power and influence over its members' affairs—often, in the case of weaker nations, to the point of setting the terms of their domestic economic policies.

Besides the Zambia case, the fund has forced stringent austerity measures in 21 deficit-plagued nations over the past several years. In 1974 and 1977, it issued new lines of credit to Italy and the United Kingdom. In June, it approved a loan to Jamaica. And now, IMF officials are in the midst of negotiating with war-torn Zaire. What's more, international experts say the fund's clout is growing almost daily.

The question is, how is the IMF's bureaucracy, housed in a bulky, atrium-topped building on 19th Street, exercising its new power? Some critics say the fund is too arbitrary and inflexible—overly tough on developing countries, and insensitive to the "human" consequences of the belt-tightening it prescribes for problem-ridden nations.

Indeed, fund-mandated government austerity programs recently led to rioting in Peru and Egypt, with residents protesting their leaders' decisions to raise domestic prices. And diplomats from some developing nations regularly grouse that IMF officials demand more of smaller countries than large ones. "If the big countries resist," says one, "the fund disappears."

were treated as little more than a gentleman's game. Fund field representatives held annual "consultations" with all member governments. But their urgings were taken with a grain of salt—particularly if the sitting government disagreed.

But now, with the past few years' dramatic changes in the world economic situation, the fund has become a power to be reckoned with. "These days," says one international economist, "when the IMF talks, more and more countries are listening." And so are private banks and other international lending institutions.

The big multinational banks, in fact, are among the big winners in the fund's hardline approach. Although the money lent by the IMF ostensibly is for government-to-government balance-of-payments transactions, once it's in a countrys' hands it can be used to pay off loans to private banks if need be. And the IMF's policy prescriptions serve to guarantee the banks that the country will be a better credit risk.

The IMF's heightened new influence stems basically from two developments:

The sharp rise in oil prices the Arab nations engineered in 1973 has thrown more countries into deficit—and dependence on IMF loans to save them from bankruptcy. Since private banks rely heavily on IMF judgments—and backup—in their own lending to countries, the fund's pronouncements on policy have extra weight. If a nation wants the IMF's seal of approval, it has to toe the line.

The recent overhaul of the international monetary system has given the fund formal new authority to exercise "surveillance" over problem countries that have severe payments imbalances. While no one yet knows precisely how much power that entails, the charter revisions have given the IMF's recommendations increased status.

The fund's say-so over domestic economic policies of individual countries stems primarily from its power over its own purse strings—specifically, the conditions it sets for making loans to countries that are in difficulty over exceptionally large balance-of-payments deficits. (A country gets into deficit when its imports and investments abroad outstrip its exports and intake of capital.)

The IMF's role in the world economic system essentially is that of a policeman for the "haves"—other fund members, the nations that have lent money to financially troubled countries, and, indirectly, the large multinational banks. (The World Bank, the fund's sister organization, deals with helping the "have-nots" by offering grants or low-interest loans for economic development projects in poor countries.)

If a rich or poor nation gets into balance-of-payments difficulty, the fund steps in—often as lender of last resort—with an offer to help bail out that government by providing a sizable line of credit. But the credit is hinged on the condition that the country adopt stringent fiscal and monetary policies designed to eliminate its payments deficit. The more a country wants to borrow, the stiffer the terms the IMF sets. Often, by the time a country seeks fund help, it's too late for anything but severe belt-tightening.

Fund officials argue that the tradeoff is fair enough: Were it not for the IMF's underwriting, the individual nations would go bankrupt, and would have to impose much harsher austerity programs than those the funds insists on. Like a benevolent banker, the fund aims for gradually restoring economic health to the deficit country—not pay up on the spot.

Under the basic IMF loan system, nations may borrow up to 100 percent of their "quota," or membership fee in the fund, divided into four separate "tranches" or lending categories, each with a progressively tougher set of strings attached. There also are special longer-term lending pools from which members may borrow additional amounts.

It's the power to set conditions for making loans that gives the fund most of its clout. The organization's charter is worded vaguely enough that officials are free to establish whatever terms they think are needed. Talks between the government and fund representatives often last for weeks. At the end, everything must be approved by the IMF executive board.

The results often are striking. In Zambia's case, for example, the government won a credit line of $305 million, but had to devalue its currency by 10 percent and sharply slash spending. Great Britain won authority to borrow up to $4 billion, but had to raise interest rates and pare spending. Jamaica received $244 million—after devaluing and promising to slow wage increases.

Moreover, the IMF continues to influence national policies even after a loan is granted, because the aid usually is only for a year or so and requires a "performance evaluation" for renewal. So, Jamaica this year had to renegotiate a new domestic economic program after its 1977 efforts failed to meet the fund's criteria. And IMF officials prodded Sri Lanka into its most sweeping economic reforms ever.

IMF authorities insist the fund doesn't "dictate" domestic policies to individual countries. In the first place, the terms it sets almost always are worded in the euphemisms of international economics, unlikely to offend any government. "We never ask a country to devaluate its currency," an insider says. "We just agree on limits for net foreign assets of its central bank."

Secondly, fund negotiators almost always suggest several options for governments on each major issue. In the Zambian case, for example, IMF representatives suggested five or six approaches for achieving each economic goal, and then Zambian officials chose among them, based on domestic political considerations.

There's often been criticism that the IMF's judgments are made by staff, not political officials, meaning that nation's policies, in effect, are determined by sometimes youthful economists who never have been elected to office. In essence, that criticism is accurate. But often the IMF staff members are experienced. And in all cases, their work is reviewed by top fund officials and the executive board.

In the case of the Zambian negotiations, all four fund field team members were economists: a 40-year-old Italian, who has spent his career with the IMF and other international economic institutions; a 33-year-old Japanese economist; a 30-year-old Finn, and a 29-year-old London School of Economics graduate who has been at the fund seven years.

Their proposals, the result of weeks of work, were approved by Zambian policymakers and top IMF officials. The decisions at the Zambian end were made by the prime minister and finance minister.

William B. Dale, a former U.S. Treasury official who is the fund's deputy managing-director, insists that "the fund can't dictate a nation's domestic economic policy." Even if a country "agreed to whatever we suggested," he says, "it's they, not we, who administer the policy. They've got to become satisfied the policies are correct before they adopt them."

And Paul A. Volcker, former U.S. undersecretary of the treasury for monetary affairs and now president of the New York Federal Reserve Bank, says the fund's analysts usually are right on target. "You can pick your individual instances where in hindsight there's been some problem," Volcker says, "but by and large the fund people do their jobs pretty well."

Still, in the end, even fund insiders agree, the bottom line is whether the deficit-plagued country wants the IMF's money and imprimatur. "The borrowing countries accept the terms because they need the IMF's Good Housekeeping seal of approval," says a U.S. official familiar with the negotiation process. "They know they can't function without it."

Adds one high developing-country policymaker involved recently in negotiating an IMF loan for his country: "It's just astonishing how much authority the IMF mission chief has. You're really dealing with a high-class bunch of people here, and on balance I'd have to say they were fair. But the staff has one hell of a lot of clout."

Fund officials deny the agency is more stringent with developing countries than with industrial nations—citing as examples recent demands on the United Kingdom and Italy. "It's fairly obvious we're not going to push big or small countries if they don't want to," one fund source concedes. "The difficulty is, the smaller countries are in financial trouble more often."

Nevertheless, as holder of the purse strings, the fund can get tough when it wants to. In ongoing negotiations with Zaire, a beleaguered Mobuto government already has agreed to give the IMF extensive influence over the country's economic policies as part of a $1 billion plan to bolster its shaky regime. There even will be an IMF "technical adviser" in the Zairian central bank.

And Robert Solomon, a former Federal Reserve Board international monetary adviser who now is at the Brookings Institution, suggests there may be some truth to the charges that larger countries—and those with balance-of-payments surpluses, which theoretically are supposed to be as bad as deficits—emerge less scathed.

"The fund may indeed have been too tough on some countries," Solomon says, "We seem to have fashioned a monetary system with the same old prejudices—that a deficit is bad but a surplus is good." He also is critical of the way IMF policy prescriptions are formulated: "You sometimes get the feeling that some pretty junior staff people are in effect mandating policy."

In any case, there seems to be agreement that the organization's demands are rarely really unfounded. As a U.S. official puts it, "The problem isn't the fund—the problem is the countries are in a bind and need to take drastic steps to get out. The reality is that the IMF loan makes it less painful for these countries to make their adjustments—even with the demands the fund makes."

The question is, how much is the fund's insistence an unwarranted intrusion on national sovereignty? While some countries go kicking and screaming to the IMF's bargaining tables, others seem to welcome the fund's toughness as a cover for imposing needed cutbacks they know will be unpopular. "The fund makes a terrific scapegoat," one policymaker says.

In still other cases, the governments sometimes turn out to be too weak or ill-equipped to carry cutback programs on their own.

In Peru, for example, outside observers say it's unlikely the regime would have been able to slash programs without fund intervention. And onlookers say Zairian officials simply weren't technically able to develop their own programs.

At least some of the criticism over the way the fund treats developing countries may be reduced as a result of a new approach to IMF lending involving longer-term loans. Until recently, the major form of IMF lending has been to extend credit to a country for a year at a time. If the government did not perform as expected, the line of credit simply was canceled.

Under the new program, however, the fund now works out a longer-term plan with borrowing nations designed to help restore the local economy over a three-year period. In the case of Jamaica, where Prime Minister Michael Manley has criticized IMF officials for not fully "understanding" poorer nations' needs, policymakers are viewing the new procedure as "a better tool" for the IMF to use.

What is less certain is how much influence the fund will be able to exert on nations that aren't actually trying to borrow money—such as West Germany, Denmark, or even the United States. Although the organization's newly revised charter grants it increased power in this area, the rules of the game haven't been drawn yet. "They're still feeling their way," a knowledgeable onlooker says.

Dale and other IMF officials insist that "we're taking the matter seriously" in trying to develop standards and procedures for policing countries that are not currently borrowing, but some observers are skeptical. "The fact is, they're just not going to be able to force any nation to make cutbacks if it doesn't need IMF money," one observer says.

The issue may be decided quickly, however. Jacques de Larosiere, the fund's new managing-director, was a coauthor (along with former U.S. treasury undersecretary Edwin H. Yeo) of the fund's new "surveillance" power, and is said to be taking a more aggressive stance than his predecessor, former Dutch finance minister H. Johannes Witteveen.

The fund's directors are appointed by the various finance ministries of the IMF's 130 member nations and take their policy instructions from their home governments. The voting power of the directors is weighted according to the size of the economy of the nation they represent. The U.S. director controls just under 21 percent of the votes. Zambia's ballot is counted in with those of several other African nations as a single regional vote.

In any case, the corner has been turned for the once-toothless IMF. To the officials in the Zambian treasury—and others in governments throughout the industrial and developing world—the fund now is a force to be respected. And for better or worse, analysts say that's unlikely to change very soon.

IMF LOAN TERMS FORCE JAMAICAN BELT-TIGHTENING

KINGSTON, JAMAICA.—Away from this lush, mountain-capped Caribbean island, Prime Minister Michael Manley likes to portray Jamaica as a major force in the struggle by developing nations to become economically independent. In speeches in various world capitals, Manley calls repeatedly for a "new international economic order" for poorer countries. He often laments big-power "imperialism."

At home, however, Manley is being forced to put his country's economy through the wringer, precisely to satisfy the demands of these very industrial nations. Almost bankrupt from an outsized balance of payments deficit, Jamaica has had to take out a $244 million, three-year loan from the International Monetary Fund. And that means meeting IMF terms for getting its economy up to snuff.

Jamaica's new belt-tightening is one of 21 cases in the past several years in which the IMF has required borrowing nations to take stringent austerity measures to qualify for multilateral aid—part of the 130-member organization's growing power in the face of changing economic conditions. Technically, the fund doesn't mandate specific policy changes. But it won't lend the money until it's satisfied with a country's program.

To meet the IMF's conditions, Jamaica last month began gulping down a harsh dose of economic medicine that includes a massive 30 percent devaluation of its currency, stringent controls on imports, a series of big tax increases on manufacturing and tourists, higher interest rates, limits on credit expansion and a tight wage ceiling on workers' raises.

The result has been a virtual shock wave for already hard-hit Jamaican workers, and a new jolt for the island's close-knit middle class that has sent many fleeing to the United States. Despite government subsidies, prices of many necessities—such as food and gasoline—have jumped more than 30 percent since early May. Domestic business is off. And jobs are scarce.

A can of condensed milk—a staple to the island's poorer families—now costs more than 50 cents at Jamaican food stores. Cigarettes run $1.36 for a pack of 20. And gasoline now costs $3 a gallon in Jamaican currency. Even beer prices have soared—to 65 cents a bottle, up from 41 cents two weeks ago. Says one prominent union leader: "You look at this thing and you just want to cry."

Moreover, Manley's leftish "democratic socialist" government, which won a landslide victory last December before the country's financial straits were made public, is now coming under increasing criticism from both labor and business. Although the charismatic Manley is not up for reelection until 1981, his supporters concede they're no longer fully confident of being returned to office.

Admittedly, terms or no terms, almost everyone in Jamaica agrees the hardship would have been a lot stiffer if the IMF had rejected Jamaica's loan application. Without the IMF money, a high Jamaican official says, private banks would have curtailed their lending and foreign exporters would have cut off short-term credit, stifling needed trade.

With problems of that magnitude, the remedies would have been harsher. "To try to go it alone would have meant operating a siege economy," a finance ministry official said. "You'd virtually have to retire from international commerce, which would be next to suicide for a country that has to import as much as we do. And that would mean serious political upheaval. There really was no choice."

The question is, did the IMF go too far in prodding Jamaica to accept these harsh terms, and how much did Manley's government have to say about what policies it would adopt to meet the fund's terms? Manley himself often has criticized international lending agencies for failing to take account of the "fragile" economies of developing countries. Was this another such IMF fluff?

The negotiations leading up to last month's loan came against a backdrop of continued decline in the Jamaican economy. Caught amid high oil prices, falling revenues from its sugar exports and a tradition of heavy government spending, Jamaica gradually ran down its monetary reserves. Inflation intensified. Layoffs increased. The nation was facing an economic disaster.

In 1977, Manley applied for—and got—a $78 million line of credit from the fund. But after months of halfhearted cutbacks—including an abortive austerity program imposed after Manley won his December 1976 reelection—Jamaica failed to meet previously agreed on economic targets, and the fund closed the window on the loan. The government tried to get along without the IMF's help but eventually it asked for another loan.

Last February, an IMF field team flew down to Jamaica to begin negotiations for the loan, but—with the previous year's performance in mind—insisted on a much tougher set of conditions. On IMF prodding, Jamaica was forced even before the talks began to agree to a 15 percent currency devaluation. When negotiators did sit down in earnest, fund officials were decidedly stern.

Just how much Jamaica was coerced into adopting the policies it did, and how much flexibility it had to pick and choose, depends on the perspective. Although both sides agree that the fund didn't actually dictate the measures it wanted Manley to adopt, the goals the field team set were so specific, it was hard to avoid the tough decisions.

The fund team was headed by David Finch, a bespectacled, fiftyish Australian who has spent his career as an IMF field representative. Far from being dictatorial, Jamaican officials report, Finch and other staffers were almost deferential about what policies Jamaica would have to adopt. (Earlier, Finch had handled loans to Italy and Great Britain as well.)

As a Jamaican official in on the talks describes it, "They never told us specifically what policies we had to follow to qualify. All they would say was, 'You show me what you want to do and I'll tell you if it's correct.' By the end, we were pleading with them, 'Please just impose your conditions and be done with it.' But they said Jamaica had to make up its own mind."

To their credit, Finch and other team members spent their first several weeks simply studying the Jamaican situation, conferring with union and business leaders to see how much each side would be willing to sacrifice. In the process, even Jamaican officials were astonished at their thoroughness. "I learned a lot about this island," one says, "that I didn't know before."

The negotiators' jobs also were made easier because the loan was carried out under a new form of lending pool that gives borrowing nations up to three years—in contrast to the normal one year—to get their financial houses back in order. And a western observer adds pointedly: "There also was more than usual regard for appearances. The IMF people were well aware of third world attitudes toward the fund."

But ultimately, finance ministry policymakers say, Finch was determined about what Jamaica could and couldn't do. "He's by far the toughest negotiator I've ever run into," says one senior official here. "He'd never say no—just sit there, patiently, like some sort of professor, and then say, 'Yes, but . . .' The gnawing thing was he was so nice about it you couldn't get angry."

By April, there were only two major points of disagreement.

Jamaican officials resented Finch's demand that they devalue their currency by 30 percent (15 percent at the start, and 15 percent a month until the 30 percent is reached). "Our feeling was that 15 percent in total would have been enough," a high Jamaican official recalls. "But we finally had to do it, all 30 percent."

The second was the government's plans to take over all importing through a state trade corporation. The IMF team contended that with so many of Jamaica's trade transactions now coming through U.S. and British subsidiaries, a takeover now would discourage needed expansion. The result was a compromise: Jamaica would "monitor" imports, and if things got out of hand, Manley could publicly call attention to the problem.

On the rest of the package, there was "virtual unanimity," a ministry official asserts: Jamaica would devalue its dollar according to the IMF formula; Manley would try to hold the line on government spending and boost taxes to reduce the budget deficit; imports would be controlled tightly and wage increases would be held to 15 percent.

There's no question these policies have resulted in hardships. Since the program went into effect last month, prices have risen sharply for almost everything, including basic necessities; retail sales have fallen off visibly, in some cases by as much as 40 percent and workers, deprived of catch-up pay increases, are being caught in a squeeze.

For Jason R., a 48-year-old blue-collar worker (Many Jamaicans are loathe to use their full names in print, for fear of losing patronage jobs), the dilemma is acute. The gaunt father of six earns $40 a week at his full-time job. But he must spend $30 for food alone, $10 a week for rent, $5 for transportation and $10 for lunches for his school-age youngsters.

For now, Jason R. is eking out a living by dipping into a small nest egg the family accrued when his wife worked as a domestic in the United States a few years ago. But in two weeks, that money will be gone, and Mrs. R's visa expired in the interim. "We buy a lot less of everything," he says. "One pound of flour instead of two, half of what we used to before."

Lascelles Beckford, labor chief of the opposition-allied Bustamante Industrial Trade Union, says such pinching has become commonplace for Jamaica's poorer workers, many of whom still earn the national minimum wage of $24 a week. "You try to write down a typical family's budget," he says, "and you just look at the figures and crumple up the paper. But it's true."

Moreover, the squeeze is so bad it's even hitting the middle class, many of whom are simply giving up and emigrating to Miami. Alvin B., a 29-year-old bank manager, is planning now for just such a move as soon as he can arrange it. "It's really hitting like hell," he says. "We just can't enjoy the same standard of living we had before.

Not surprisingly, union leaders have protested the government's new wage ceiling, which is preventing workers from keeping up with the new rise in prices. Even the Manley-affiliated National Workers' Union is criticizing the prime minister's policies. Says the NWU's president, Carlisle Dunkley: "What we're saying is, 'What assurances can you give us on prices? And they can't.

Business leaders also are upset. Bruce Rickards, a director of Grace-Kennedy & Co., a major food distributor here, complains that "many items have now been priced out of the reach of ordinary citizens. We're facing problems we've never had before," he says. "The whole thing is turning out to be diminished returns to the very government that needs it. It's a disaster."

Still, despite the widespread hardship, there's been relatively little criticism of the IMF. A nationwide public opinion poll published last week by Carl Stone of the Kingston-based University of the West Indies showed 46 percent of Jamaicans in favor of the IMF loan deal, and 40 percent opposed—not a bad plurality in the island's volatile political structure.

If anything, most of the blame is being laid squarely on Manley. Says the NWU's Dunkley, usually an ally of the prime minister's: "Sure it was a tough deal. But when you go to a bank, you have to do what they tell you. The fact is that Jamaica for too long has delayed the actions needed to restore financial stability. So now, you might say, the chickens are coming home to roost."

To many observers, the immediate question is whether the government can keep the lid on wages—an element most Jamaican economists regard as the key to the program's success. Although unions and employers are obligated to obey the guidelines, Manley might have to loosen them if opposition intensifies. So far, protests have been perfunctory. But things could heat up if prices rise more.

There also are longer-range problems. As a finance ministry official explains it, the strategy of the IMF team was to use "a short, hopefully temporary jolt of inflation to help dampen workers' buying power and bring consumption into line with production. The problem was solved as it had to be—with a crunch," he says. "It's a novel approach, but we think it will work."

The dilemma is, dampening consumption is only half of what Jamaicans have to do. The other side is to begin spurring production. And on this, Jamaica may well be in an economic Catch 22. To help eliminate its payments deficit, the government must crimp the economy to curtail consumption. But that in turn makes it more difficult to resume production. So, where does the cycle end?

Was the IMF, then, too tough on Jamaica? By a wide majority, both government officials and private sector spokesmen insist it was not. "The negotiations were tough, but the IMF people weren't unfair," says Richard Fletcher, the No. 2 man at Jamaica's embattled finance ministry. "There was only one technical matter on which we disagreed. For the rest, we made the key decisions ourselves."

Another top official puts it more candidly: "Just look at the alternatives," he says. "Bilateral aid is a possibility when you have sympathetic men in the State Department, but otherwise I really prefer international organizations. And the big multinational bank boys are nice guys—when you don't need them. When you're in a bind, they just disappear. . . ."

Mr. JAVITS. The second article focuses on the recent negotiations on a stabilization plan between an IMF team and the Government of Jamaica. In describing the relationship between the stabilization program which the Government of Jamaica finally adopted and the role of the IMF, the author of the series, Art Pine, asked and answered the following question; and I quote "Was the IMF, then, too tough on Jamaica? By a wide majority both government officials and private-sector spokesmen insist it was not. "The negotiations were tough, but the IMF people weren't unfair," says Richard Fletcher, the No. 2 man at Jamaica's embattled finance ministry. "There was only one technical matter on which we disagreed. For the rest, we made the key decisions ourselves."

Furthermore, he quotes a leading Jamaican as saying,

> The fact is that Jamaica for too long has delayed the actions needed to restore financial stability. So now, you might say, the chickens are coming home to roost.

Mr. President, there is a technical question about whether an appropriation is needed to fund the U.S. contribution to the Witteveen Facility. While we will be providing funds to the IMF, we will be receiving in exchange a future call on the assets of the IMF, should the occasion arise. Thus, what we have here is an "exchange of assets" without any need for an appropriation. Senator SCHWEIKER and his colleagues, however, believe that the full amount of $1.8 billion in an appropriation is necessary. I disagree. What is needed, at the most, is an appropriation of $200 million to cover any possible foreign exchange losses arising from the fact that our contribution is earmarked in SDRs rather than dollars.

Mr. President, I would like to stress that, if we are to decide today on appropriating the U.S. contribution to the Witteveen Facility, that appropriation should not be misconstrued as being a precedent for the next quota increase of the IMF. There are: First, several distinctions between the U.S. quota in the IMF and U.S. participation in the facility. The Witteveen Facility involves a temporary supplement to IMF resources and, unlike quotas in the IMF, is not a permanent part of the IMF's financing structure.

Any gains or losses resulting from fluctuations on the U.S. dollar value of our SDR-denominated reserve claims arising from the U.S. quota in the IMF would only be realized if the United States were to withdraw from the IMF or the IMF were liquidated. The possibility of realizing such gains or losses is thus inconceivable and, in any case, would be impossible to estimate. In contrast, net "gains" or "losses" on U.S. participation in the Witteveen Facility will be realized, at the latest, within 12 years.

A technical legal distinction can be made that U.S. claims on the IMF arising from participation in the facility are not as liquid as U.S. claims arising from the U.S. quota in the IMF. In the former case, the United States can encash its claims upon a representation of balance-of-payments need. That representation must be given the "overwhelming benefit of the doubt," language intended to convey automaticity, but as a technical matter the representation could be challanged by the Fund. (In practice, such representations by members have never been challenged.) In contrast, under the Articles of Agreement of the Fund, a member's representation of balance-of-payments need to use its reserve claims arising from its quota in the IMF cannot legally be challenged.

In light of these distinctions between U.S. participation in the facility and in the IMF itself, as well as the difference in views expressed here today, it would be appropriate for Congress to carefully reexamine the budget and appropriations issue prior to approving the next quota increase in the IMF. Both the Foreign Relations and the Banking Committees have called for such a study to be made.

Mr. President, we will also be inundated by amendments which in one way or another will have the effect of severely limiting the effectiveness of the facility. I am particularly concerned about the Human Rights and Human Needs amendment that Senater ABOUREZK plans to introduce. As we, the comanagers of the bill, indicated in our "Dear Colleague" letter, while we share the concerns reflected in the Abourezk amendment, we oppose the amendment because:

First. It opens the door to noneconomic criteria for the use of IMF resources. The IMF has remained remarkably free of political conflicts; membership encompasses Communist and non-Communist States, Greece and Turkey, Israel and its Arab adversaries, South Africa and the front-line Black African States, India and Pakistan, and scores of other potential political and military opponents.

Second. The amendment assumes too direct a cause-and-effect relationship between an IMF stabilization program and internal political decisions made in member countries. As substantiated by the article on Jamaica in the Washington Post, measures which a government will take to meet the IMF's broad economic targets are not dictated by the IMF but are worked out jointly by the IMF and the borrowing government.

Third. Economic stability is essential to long-term economic growth and development. It is inevitably that almost any economic austerity program will, in the short run, reduce the overall living standard of the country in question. The Witteveen Facility, which will permit countries to design longer term stabilization programs with less rigid limits on government external borrowing, domestic deficits, and in turn, on public consumption, was created to enable the IMF to ameliorate that problem. In the long run, healthy economic conditions provide a better climate for the observance of basic human needs and rights than inflation, falling growth rates, shortages of consumer goods and imports, and rising unemployment.

Regarding the amendments that Senator HELMS will introduce, I can only say that their effect is abundantly clear: to gut the facility and to jeopardize the whole international monentary system. It is unthinkable that the United States could pull out of the IMF. Even serious consideration of such a move would totally destabilize the international monetary system.

Mr. President, in sum, the facility will help to assure a more stable and smoothly functioning international monentary system and a sound world economy. The United States is heavily dependent on such a world economy, and the facility represents a major element of our program to achieve it.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the legislation pending before the Senate, S. 2152, would authorize U.S. participation in the supplementary financing facility, the so-called Witteveen Facility, of the International Monetary Fund. This bill has broad implications not only for U.S. economic interests, but for our foreign policy as well.

The facility will provide approximately $10.7 billion in additional financial resources to the IMF. These funds will be used by the IMF to provide medium term balance-of-payments financing to member countries facing serious balance of payments difficulties.

Since the oil price explosion of 1973, both industrial and developing countries have suffered a major dislocation in their balance of payments. While the oil producing countries have been piling up tens of billions of dollars in payments surpluses, much of the rest of the world have been staggering under the burden of a collective deficit which last year totaled over $70 billion. The IMF has played a major role in providing nations with emergency funds which can tide them over at least for the short term, while they make the necessary adjustments in their trading accounts.

However, this problem of oil-related deficits has proved itself resistant to the usual short term adjustments techniques normally used by governments to restore a balance in their trade accounts. Therefore, there has been not only an enormous demand for the fund's resources, but also a crying need for a facility which can provide financial support for longer than the usual IMF term of 6 months to a year.

The Witteveen Facility will go a long way toward meeting both needs. Not only will it replenish the fund's resources, which are down now to approximately $15 billion, but it will also provide a facility from which countries may borrow up to 7 years. This extended lending period will allow countries a longer adjustment period, thereby easing the economic and political strains that are often created by economic austerity measures that may be required to close the gap between imports and exports.

This facility is unique in another respect as well. This is the first instance in which the surplus oil producing countries have agreed to share equally with the industrial countries, the burden of providing financial assistance to nations in balance-of-payments trouble. The industrial countries will be putting up 50 percent of the $10.7 billion and the OPEC countries will be providing the other 50 percent. U.S. participation amounts to only about 17 percent of the total, while Saudi Arabia is providing approximately 24 percent.

Moreover, U.S. participation involves no real financial cost or risk to the Treasury. For every dollar we transfer to the facility, we will receive a monetary reserve claim on the IMF. If the United States should need to draw on these assets for balance-of-payments reasons, it has every right to do so.

The money which the United States provides to the facility will be repaid in eight semi-annual installments beginning 3½ years after the financing was provided. The funds will be repaid with interest covering the cost of borrowing to the Treasury, so there will be no net interest cost involved. The only possible potential loss that could result from U.S. participation would come about if there is a change in the relative exchange rate between the dollar and the SDR during the period in which our contribution is outstanding.

I would not contend that the Witteveen Facility is a panacea for all of the economic and financial dislocations that have beset the world economy in the last few years. Far from it. However, it is a positive step, particularly in that it involves a major cooperative effort between the industrial and oil exporting countries.

The United States has taken a strong lead in bringing about this faciilty. All the other participants have ratified the agreement and are prepared to provide their share of the funds. Activation of the facility now depends solely upon action by the U.S. Congress. The House has already approved U.S. participation in the facility.

I urge my Senate colleagues to vote favorably upon S. 2152, so that the United States may take its place as a participant in the Witteveen Facility.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1535

(PURPOSE: To impose a trade embargo against Uganda)

Mr. WEICKER. I have an amendment at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1535.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I propose the amendment on behalf of Senator MARK O. HATFIELD, Senator METZENBAUM, and myself. I also ask unanimous consent that Senator DOLE be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. I would read the amendment to my colleagues:

SEC. 3. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the Government of Uganda, under the regime of General Idi Amin, has committed genocide against Ugandans;

(2) the United States maintains substantial trade with the Republic of Uganda; and

(3) the relationship of the United States with Uganda is unique and justifies an exceptional response by the United States to the actions of the Government of Uganda.

(b) It is the sense of the Congress that the Government of the United States should take steps to disassociate itself from any foreign government which engages in the international crime of genocide.

(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, after date of enactment of this section, no corporation, institution, group or individual may import, directly or indirectly, into the United States or its territories or possessions any article grown, produced, or manufactured in Uganda until the President determines and certifies to the Congress that the Government of Uganda is no longer committing gross violations of human rights.

(d) Section 4 of the Export Administration Act of 1969 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "(m) No article material, or supply, including technical data or other information, other than cereal grains and additional food products, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States or exported by any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, may be exported to Uganda until the President determines and certifies to the Congress that the Government of Uganda is no longer committing gross violations of human rights."

(e) The Congress directs the President to encourage and support international actions, including economic restrictions, to respond to conditions in the Republic of Uganda.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, on this amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I support the Uganda boycott legislation. The regime of Idi Amin offends the conscience of every decent human being. Roughly one-third of his revenue comes from U.S. coffee purchases. We cannot tolerate this situation any longer.

I am delighted to note that the Weicker-Hatfield amendment is intended to stop U.S. corporations from importing coffee from Uganda, directly or indirectly. That is to say, corporations would not, under this amendment, be permitted to purchase Ugandan coffee through their European subsidaries and reexport it to the United States as they have been doing. Without this provision, the boycott legislation would be ineffective.

I hope that other countries follow suit in this initiative. Idi Amin cannot survive without his coffee revenue. An international embargo aganst his regime is long overdue.

In supporting the Ugandan trade embargo, we should not be seen to be engaging in selective morality. There are other nations in Africa which likewise are gross violators of human rights and we should take a look at these as well. South Africa is the most prominent example.

Let me also say that I do not think that Idi Amin is typical of African leaders. Indeed, he is a great embarrassment to most of them. Some of the most prominent leaders, like President Nyerere and President Kaunda, the heads of state of Tanzania and Zambia, spoke out earlier than most in condemning this murderer. They repeated their criticism of him when they each visited this country recently.

But African countries do not contribute to the maintenance of his regime, as we do. They have less leverage than the West in bringing influence to bear on ending the atrocities in Uganda. We have to act according to our good conscience in this matter. We may not, in our own action, bring down this brutal regime. But we may encourage more international action. At the very least, we can say we did the right thing and our own hands are now clean. We will, with this amendment, completely end any association we have with this ruthless tyrant.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the pending amendment, and ask that it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1536:

In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted by UP Amendment No. 1535, insert the following:

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted by UP 1535 insert the following:

In recent years the Government of the Republic of Uganda has engaged in a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights;

The United States holds such actions to be unacceptable and has already taken certain measures to express its abhorrence of human rights conditions in Uganda;

The United Nations Human Rights Commission has agreed to and is currently preparing for study missions in order to investigate charges of violations of rights in Uganda;

The Government of the Republic of Uganda continues to earn significant amounts of foreign exchange from exports of coffee to the United States and other countries; and

Repressive measures taken by the Ugandan Government have aroused deep concern among Americans and throughout the international community:

(a) The Congress strongly condemns the gross violations of human rights, and other acts which suppress freedom of political thought and violate the rights of individuals, which have been committed by Idi Amin and the Government of the Republic of Uganda, and the Congress urges the President of the United States to support, and where possible, implement measures, such as an embargo on trade with Uganda, which would effectively discourage United States support of the Government of Uganda.

(b) The Congress urges the President of the United States to encourage and support international efforts to investigate and respond to conditions in the Republic of Uganda, including economic restrictions.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I know of the strong feelings of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut. I share his abhorrence of the Idi Amin regime.

In recent weeks, I have conducted hearings for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The testimony we received at those hearings underscores the fact that the people of Uganda are living under an African Hitler. The brutality, the gross, systematic violation of fundamental human rights, the execution of thousands of Ugandan citizens on a scale that can only be described as genocide, constitutes a specter of horror that we must no longer countenance by purchase of Ugandan coffee.

Let it be understood that the U.S. Government is not represented by an Ambassador to Uganda. Our Ambassador was removed some years ago.

Further, let it be understood that the United States extends no form of aid to the Idi Amin government, either military or economic. But until recently American coffee companies have purchased approximately one-third of the Uganda coffee crop, and something in excess of 95 percent of all of the foreign exchange earnings realized by the Ugandan Government comes from coffee exports.

I think all of us recognize that it is not within the power of the United States to reform or restructure or remodel other governments. As a practical matter, we must take them pretty much as they come. But since the United States does have a genuine interest in human rights abroad, since our President, Jimmy Carter, has given new emphasis to freedom and human rights as a major component of American foreign policy, we have begun to withhold American aid, sometimes military aid and sometimes economic aid, from governments which are found to be engaging in gross violations of human rights.

I think that is entirely proper. Even though there may be little we can do to change the character of these governments, there is no reason whatever that we should continue to extend governmental aid to them.

(Mr. HODGES assumed the chair.)

Mr. CHURCH. We face another question when it comes to the matter of trade. I think in most cases, trade is a commercial undertaking unrelated to the government. And since trade is a two-way street that clearly benefits the United States as well as the country with which the trade is conducted, a different rule has to apply in such a case.

Yet there are cases, there are governments in this world, that simply have gone beyond the pale, and are not entitled, by virtue of their conduct, to normal relations with civilized nations.

I think Uganda falls in this category. It is not the only government that deserves to be isolated from its contact with the civilized world. Certainly, Cambodia has engaged in barbarities of a kind that would clearly qualify it for such treatment.

However, Mr. President, we have no contact whatever with Cambodia. We maintain no relations with that country, we have no aid program of any kind, and we engage in no trade of any kind with Cambodia.

With respect to Uganda, however, our hearings demonstrated that the major sustenance of the Idi Amin regime is derived from the proceeds of the sale of Ugandan coffee. One-third of the coffee sold by Uganda each year entered the American market. This situation called for Senate hearings. It cried out for congressional review. I am happy to say that both the House of Representatives and the Senate have undertaken such a reexamination of American commercial relations with Uganda.

The House has passed a sense of the Congress resolution which was the direct result of the hearings conducted in the other body. It is the same resolution that I am offering today as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

I do so for several reasons:

First of all, this House resolution has produced very encouraging results, even though it does not mandate an embargo against Uganda, nor is it binding upon the administration.

Since passage of the House resolution, virtually every American company, including all the major coffee companies and all the major brokers, have voluntarily agreed to boycott Ugandan coffee. The list of the companies that have agreed not to purchase Uganda's coffee includes Chock Full 'O Nuts, Procter & Gamble—which is the Folger brand—Nestle's Coffee, General Foods—with respect to their American markets—Woodhouse, Drake & Carey Trading Co., ACLI International, Van Ekris & Stoett, Inc., J. Aron & Co., Inc., Saks International, Sprague & Rhodes Commodity Corp., Hills Brothers Coffee, Mitsui & Co., William L. Marshall Coffee Co., Carl Borschsenius Co., Gill & Duffus, Inc., Carson M. Simon & Co., and, finally, M.J.B. Co.

This is a very impressive list. Together, these companies represent the largest aggregate purchasers in the United States of Ugandan coffee.

There are some companies that have not followed suit. But I am inclined to believe that, if the Senate adopts the same resolution as was adopted by the House, we will soon find the few remaining American companies that have not voluntarily terminated further purchases of Ugandan coffee joining in. That is one reason I urge the adoption of the substitute. In many ways, I think it has greater impact if our own companies voluntarily stop these purchases because of their deep concern over the brutality of the Ugandan Government.

But the resolution goes further. It urges the President of the United States to encourage and support international efforts to investigate and respond to conditions in the Republic of Uganda, including economic restrictions.

In our hearings, Mr. President, we discovered that any unilateral action on our part is likely to be ineffective unless we are joined by the other principal importers of Ugandan coffee—by the British, by the Germans, by the French. Clearly, the amendment being offered by the Senator from Connecticut cannot bind these other countries, so it is likely not to prove to be an effective instrument.

If we adopt this substitute, we give the President of the United States notice that the Congress wishes him to undertake those negotiations with other foreign countries that would make an embargo effective. Why proceed with a congressional embargo that could constitute, at best, a unilateral effort, that, on the basis of the testimony, we know will prove ineffective when we have an opportunity formally to urge the President to undertake the kind of negotiations that could cut off the coffee trade that the world presently is doing with Uganda?

I say, let us give the President a chance to do this. Let him know that Congress formally urges him to do this. Then if, for any reason, he decides against this course of action, or if, having undertaken negotiations in good faith with these other purchasers of Ugandan coffee, his efforts prove futile, we are still left with the option of then considering a unilateral statutory ban on all further imports of Ugandan coffee to this country.

These are the reasons, Mr. President, I think we would be better advised to adopt the same course that has already been favored by the House of Representatives.

I should like at this time to read the resolving clause of the proposed substitute and then I shall ask unanimous consent that the entire text, including the preamble, be printed in the RECORD.

The resolving clause reads:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That (a) the Congress strongly condemns the gross violations of human rights, and other acts which suppress freedom of political thought and violate the rights of individuals, which have been committed by Idi Amin and the Government of the Republic of Uganda, and the Congress urges the President of the United States to support, and where possible, implement measures, such as an embargo on trade with Uganda, which would effectively discourage United States support of the Government of Uganda.

(b) The Congress urges the President of the United States to encourage and support international efforts to investigate and respond to conditions in the Republic of Uganda, including economic restrictions.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire text be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

H. CON. RES. 612

Whereas in recent years the Government of the Republic of Uganda has engaged in a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights;

Whereas the United States holds such actions to be unacceptable and has already taken certain measures to express its abhorrence of human rights conditions in Uganda;

Whereas the United Nations Human Rights Commission has agreed to and is currently preparing for study missions in order to investigate charges of violations of rights in Uganda;

Whereas the Government of the Republic of Uganda continues to earn significant amounts of foreign exchange from exports of coffee to the United States and other countries; and

Whereas repressive measures taken by the Ugandan Government have aroused deep concern among Americans and throughout the international community: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That (a) the Congress strongly condemns the gross violations of human rights, and other acts which suppress freedom of political thought and violate the rights of individuals, which have been committed by Idi Amin and the Government of Republic of Uganda, and the Congress urges the President of the United States to support, and where possible, implement measures, such as an embargo on trade with Uganda, which would effectively discourage United States support of the Government of Uganda.

(b) The Congress urges the President of the United States to encourage and support international efforts to investigate and respond to conditions in the Republic of Uganda, including economic restrictions.

Mr. CHURCH Mr. President, I think at this time, the best way for us to proceed would be to adopt the resolution already approved by the House of Representatives. I think that we shall see such an action followed by voluntary decisions by our own principal coffee companies. In addition, the President of the United States will be strongly motivated to proceed with the kind of negotiations that could make a multilateral embargo possible. It is only the latter that will choke off the coffee trade and deny to the Ugandan regime the financial resources it now depends upon for its existence.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous consent request?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I ask unanimous consent that during the pendency of this particular measure, including the amendments to it, Dan Grady be accorded the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Connecticut is recognized.

Mr. WEICKER. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, during the debate on this measure, Jack Robertson be granted the privilege of the floor.

I ask unanimous consent that Senator SCHMITT be added as cosponsor to Senator WEICKER's and my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Peter Kirsey of my staff be granted the privilege of the floor during debate on this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following Senators be added as cosponsors of this amendment: Senators METZENBAUM, DANFORTH, MCINTYRE, BROOKE, ANDERSON, HELMS, ABOUREZK, GRAVEL, and RIBICOFF.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Arthur House be granted the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. I ask unanimous consent that Mark Edelman of Senator DANFORTH's staff be accorded the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the substitute of the Senator from Idaho and speak on behalf of the amendment originally offered by this Senator, Senator HATFIELD, and others.

The difficulty I have with the substitute amendment of the distinguished Senator from Idaho is that its effect will come too late. Indeed, we are already too late in terms of hundreds of thousands of people in Uganda whose lives have been ended by Idi Amin. Every day that we delay it is not just a question of muscle flexing, it is a question of lives.

A man like Idi Amin does not respond to sense of the Senate resolutions. He only responds when it is clear this Nation and, hopefully others on the international scene, will act.

Even now, there have been many words by politicians in this country as to the brutality that exists in that Nation. I can assure all Senators that Amin will take all the words we can dish out and he will not flinch one moment from his course of madness.

The amendment I offer is made up of the following parts:

First. A statement of congressional intent and policy in enacting this legislation.

This is where it differs sharply from the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Idaho:

Second. A provision to prohibit direct or indirect importation of goods from Uganda;

Third. An amendment to the Export Administration Act to prohibit exportation of all nonagricultural goods from the United States to Uganda; and Fourth. A directive to the President to pursue international sanctions against Amin.

Let me quickly review the essential facts which confront us in the case of Uganda.

First. Up to 300,000 Ugandans have been killed under the Amin regime. Government directed genocide and terror have shredded the fabric of Ugandan society.

Second. The United States, during all the killing of these 300,000 people, has been Uganda's largest trading partner in her crucial export market. American companies bought $245 million in Uganda coffee last year, 33 percent of her exports, and over 15 percent of her GNP.

Third. Amin's economy runs on a single government-controlled crop: coffee. Coffee exports, administered by a government agency, provide 85 percent of the annual government revenue of Uganda, most of which goes for military equipment and mercenaries.

Fourth. Over 90 percent of the Ugandan population has been driven into subsistence farming. The devastated economy no longer produces consumer goods or provides civilian jobs. Only Uganda's fertile soil and favorable climate have averted mass starvation.

What has been the response of the U.S. Government to this starvation?

The Secretary of State has told Congress that we are doing all we can and should do about human rights in Uganda.

Over 6 weeks ago the House of Representatives passed a resolution—very much along the lines of that offered by the distinguished Senator from Idaho—urging President Carter to take some action against Amin.

That was 6 weeks ago. I do not know how many lives ago, but it was 6 weeks ago.

What has been the reaction of the White House? Silence, absolute silence.

Our U.N. delegation gives us the good news that after 7 years of Amin's terror, that the U.N. Human Rights Commission has finally decided to study the problem.

In the meantime:

Several major coffee companies have joined an ad hoc, voluntary boycott, while an equal number of importers continue to trade with Amin directly, or do so by way of foreign subsidiaries.

I was disappointed to hear that two of the larger companies, General Foods and Nestle, although I believe Nestle is Swiss-owned, in spite of their announcement that they were no longer importing coffee from Uganda, have done so through their subsidiaries in foreign markets.

Our coffee companies and corporations, those who do business with Amin and those who do not, have testified before the Senate that they are floating in a foreign policy limbo, waiting for an official Government policy.

Mr. President, this amendment was drafted to meet three clear objectives:

First. To make it the unmistakable policy of the United States that we will not traffic in or do business with genocide. A genocidal government is exactly what we are dealing with in Uganda and with Mr. Amin.

Second. To end the multimillion-dollar trade between our countries in the most effective way possible to bring a halt to the killing. Our moral and diplomatic protestations about Amin mean nothing while the goods and dollars continue to flow. The amendment addresses both the export and import markets in order to completely break off our commercial relationship with his regime.

Third. To direct the President to do what he can to encourage other nations to join us in this embargo, to intensify international pressure on Amin.

Apparently, Mr. Carter is unwilling to take the most direct action. So far as I am concerned, the amendment tells him to do it and then suggests he go a step further and have the international community join the United States on this very real issue of human rights.

When is the issue of human rights going to become a fight rather than a slogan?

Here is our opportunity to take a very firm step, not one of rhetoric, but one that will hit home, and hard, and now.

Mr. President, I do not believe there is a person in this Chamber who would dispute the horror of Amin's blood sport regime. But several issues must be addressed as the Senate considers this amendment.

First. Are sanctions a proper foreign policy tool?

An economic boycott such as I have proposed involves subjecting international trade to political constraints. There can be no realistic distinction, however, in any realm of public policy, between economic circumstances and political realities. The United States has recognized this and used economic sanctions in other instances, for a number of reasons, among them political. So the question is not whether political issues should become factors in international trade, but what issues should be factors.

Genocide, in my opinion, is such an issue. As Senator CASE stated in his minority views on the last Uganda resolution passed by the Senate, there are certain prescriptive rules of behavior which apply to the rulers of all nations. Those who violate such rules jeopardize their standing in the community of nations. Uganda, because of Amin's genocidal policies, belongs outside of the fellowship of civilized nations and should thus be denied its benefits, one of which is free trade.

Second. Will sanctions work?

The State Department has opposed this legislation on the grounds that it will not be "effective" in improving rights in Uganda. Now I do not think anyone can predict with authority what would happen inside Uganda if a boycott were enacted. We know what is happening inside Uganda today. The symbolic value alone of an unequivocal American initiative against Amin could encourage Amin's own people to take steps against him. It could spur an international boycott.

We have seen the results of what this Nation can do when it commits itself, just as in the case of Rhodesia.

Sure, there might be differences in the Senate as to the various peace plans proposed. But it was only a few short years ago there was no hope of majority rule until the community of nations acted. Believe me, whatever the difficulties in Rhodesia, they are as serious, if not more so, in Uganda today.

So, yes, I think sanctions can work, where the cause is right.

Testimony by the coffee companies last month indicated that a boycott would cause a disruption in coffee markets, as buyers shifted their sources of supply. There is no telling how long this situation would take to stabilize, but without question it would mean difficult times for Amin.

Recent information from within Uganda indicates that the voluntary boycott has dried up some of Amin's foreign currency reserves, making it difficult for him to obtain petroleum products.

Amin's reward system, in which he trades whisky and cars for the loyalty of his key henchmen, is a hand-to-mouth operation. Any interruption in the flow of coffee cash and luxury goods into Uganda would create a precarious situation for Amin in his inner circle.

Amin also has a payroll of over 10,000 mercenaries to meet, which would be jeopardized by the immediate halt of U.S. purchases.

I wish that all Members of this body had the opportunity that Senator HATFIELD and I have had, in the course of the past months, to talk with those intimately involved with the situation in Uganda—whether with religious leaders, with whom Senator HATFIELD has had the opportunity to speak, or with our former ambassador, Dr. Thomas Melady, now president of Sacred Heart University in Fairfield, Conn., who described the conditions and the brutality of that regime in his book Idi Amin Dada, Hitler of Africa.

If we could read to Members of the Senate a couple of chapters from books written, not by men of the opposite political party, but by men who have been a part of Mr. Amin's inner circle and who could no longer stomach the violence and the killing and the torture, I do not think there would be one person in this Chamber who would waste 1 day on any sense of the Senate resolutions but would insist that this country act immediately.

Maybe Uganda is not big enough in the sense of its participation or effect in the cycle of world affairs. Maybe it is that there are not many Ugandans living in the United States, so they do not have a lobby. Maybe it is that the oil situation is not of such importance in Uganda that we have to tiptoe lightly in our relations with that country. But a human right is just that, anywhere, whether it is in Africa, the United States, or wherever. It is a precious thing, and our commitment to life should not be predicated upon where that life exists or under what circumstances.

People say, "What will happen to the people of Uganda in the case of such a boycott?" What is happening to the people of Uganda right now, without it? That is the question. The people of Uganda, tragically, because of what has gone on, have nothing to lose.

Unfortunately too many people have been ducking this issue, and I am glad we have the opportunity to bring it to the floor this afternoon.

The House of Representatives resolution obviously was dictated by an administration unwilling to act. I have no doubt that if this amendment proposed by Senator HATFIELD, myself, and others is adopted, it will be accepted by the House.

Human rights are and always have been the heart of our democracy in its finest hours, whether at home or abroad, whether in Yorktown or Normandy or Selma, Ala. It is what this country is all about. But we have to fight for it. We cannot just go ahead and say the worst and then sit back in our chairs. That is what is at issue here today.

I have said many times that it is the state of our spirit that determines the state of the Union. We have heard enough talk about human rights. I want to see them come into full flower, and indeed in the case of Uganda, just in the sense of being able to live.

I ask rejection of the substitute amendment, although it is a well-intentioned amendment. I have no disputes with the distinguished Senator from Idaho as to what the right thing is to do on this issue. He feels as strongly as I do. Let us make that point very clear. It is just that I feel that if the end is to be achieved, it has to be achieved in the no-nonsense language of the original amendment, and I hope that will be the language enacted by the U.S. Senate.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WEICKER. I yield.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Connecticut has been extremely eloquent, and he addresses a very legitimate problem.

I joined the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Oregon some weeks ago in writing to the President on this very issue, when we asked the President, using his authority under the Export Administration Act, to go farther than the voluntary actions taken by individual U.S. companies and to impose official sanctions on Uganda. He has not done so, and I think that this amendment, as well as the House action and the amendment of the Senator from Idaho are an expression of dissatisfaction with the halfway measures pursued to date by the Carter administration.

The second point I make is this: The Senator's amendment is not precisely germane to this legislation. Among other things, it would be germane to the Export Administration Act; it is not technically germane to the Bretton Woods agreement. Nonetheless the Senate has failed to act so far. Perhaps we will be pleasantly surprised later on this year, but I am not so sure. Nor has action been completed on the antiterrorism bill reported by the Governmental Affairs Committee which would provide an appropriate opportunity to consider this amendment. Absent that legislative opportunity, I would not in any way criticize the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Connecticut for offering this amendment at this time.

However, there is one question—and this is why I asked the Senator to yield—on which I would like his thinking, and it is this: Granted that the human rights violations by Idi Amin and Uganda are egregious, actions of other nations with respect to human rights—at least in this Senator's judgment—are equally to be condemned, equally egregious.

There come to my mind, in particular, Iraq and Libya, both of which carry their violations of human rights beyond their own borders and, by training and financing international terrorists, export the most fundamental violation of human rights that one could ever suppose to exist, and that is the deprivation of life. Life is our most fundamental human right.

So I ask my good friend from Connecticut whether he might enlighten me as to why he has chosen to limit his amendment to Uganda. Why should not his amendment include countries like Libya and Iraq? In this Senator's judgment, those countries have exported human rights violations by financing, encouraging, and providing training for active terrorism, whether it be in Munich or in Greece or in Israel or in a half-dozen other countries around the world.

Mr. WEICKER. I know this will come as a surprise to the Senator from Pennsylvania, but this Senator is limited in his capabilities and talents, in the sense that he is unable to spread himself all over the world to dealing with all the problems that confront this Nation and the world.

I do not in any way dispute the facts laid out by the Senator from Pennsylvania. Indeed, if he wants to propose an amendment, I think he should.

The fact is that on this particular issue, it is something that has drawn the attention over the years of both Senator HATFIELD and myself. Frankly, we have been unable to give it the attention it deserves or to bring about the result that this situation deserves.

It was felt that the time had come, past the time, to strike. This in no wise disputes what it is the Senator from Pennsylvania is saying, and indeed once this amendment is agreed to, then let us get to work on the other situations. What I think is important, I think the point the Senator from Pennsylvania is making is well taken, is that there is a great deal of noise coming out of this country about human rights, I think properly so.

I will be very honest with you. I think for the past several years a great deal of credit might be given to some of our foreign exploits. On the other hand, they were, I think, very disregarding of certain human issues. They might have been good tradeoffs in the sense of politics, or charisma, if you will. I do not think they were well applied to a nation like the United States. Call us naive, if you will. I like what it is we stand for, and I do not think we should trade it off.

So in that sense, finally, we came to a realization of how important human values are in achieving recognition and admiration throughout the world, but really we have been doing so much talk, talk, talk and very little act. Hopefully this will be one of those instances when we do act, which does not mean to say that similar conduct should not be forthcoming relative to other nations in the future.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am very pleased to be a cosponsor with Senator WEICKER on this amendment calling for some action regarding the problems that we have in relation to the country of Uganda.

Mr. President, my comments on the introduction of this important amendment will be brief in that I am already on the record with reasons for my strong conviction that the U.S. Government must act in unprecedented fashion against the government of the modern day Hitler, Idi Amin of Uganda.

It should be said that my sincerest hope was that the Carter administration would, in the instance of Uganda, give credence to its human rights campaign by specific actions such as trade restrictions and encouragement of the same by our allies. After several months of delay and confusion by the State Department, White House and National Security Council it has become apparent to me that the Congress must act forcefully to affect change in our trade relationship with Amin's genocidal regime. The voluntary effort by especially American coffee companies has been encouraging but, I must say, not sufficient to stop the flow of American cash into the pockets of Amin's murderous mercenaries. And coffee companies which have acted voluntarily have requested of us that we impose trade sanctions so that they would not be at a competitive disadvantage with companies which continue to purchase Ugandan products.

Therefore, the legislation which Senator WEICKER and I, introduced by way of amendment today, is an expression of our moral resolve to act appropriately toward one of the worst violators of human rights in the world today.

The final draft of this amendment is before you in unprinted form and incorporates language suggested by the Subcommittee on Africa. "No corporation, institution, group or individual may import, directly or indirectly, into the United States or its territories or possessions any article grown, produced, or manufactured in Uganda." So that the intent is clear—there are American corporations now buying Ugandan products through subsidiaries and other third parties for consumption in the United States. This law would make it impossible to do that. Further, this amendment would disallow importation until such time as "The President determines and certifies to Congress that the Government of Uganda is no longer committing gross violations of human rights." This gives, in my view, all the flexibility necessary for the President to determine appropriate action based upon an understandable standard of the world community.

Exportation would be disallowed on the date of enactment as well by this amendment for all articles, materials, supplies, including technical data and information subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, except for cereal grains and additional food products which are necessary to supplement the subsistence farming of the nearly independent Ugandan citizens.

An important point which has gone virtually undiscussed in the months of debate and hearings on the issue of a trade embargo with Uganda is the important role this issue plays in our national interest. This small East African nation, the size of my home State of Oregon, does not wield significant strategic or economic influence in the international community. It does not provide rare minerals or petroleum to the Western World. There is no doubt, however, that Uganda is destined to find its place in ignominious history. It will be referred to as a unique product of the 1970's, along with Cambodia and Equatorial Guinea. Historians will note with preplexed curiosity that this was also the decade in which the issue of human rights was introduced to international diplomacy as a central component of U.S. foreign policy.

I, for one, believe that we do have as a Nation a powerful universally applicable principle in our human rights policy that will further not only our national interest but will ease the plight of the oppressed of the world if we but steward this policy responsibly. It is in our national interest to apply this principle most forcefully to the most severe violators. For if our policy is nothing more than empty rhetoric and a few resolutions we sap it of its power and place oppressed peoples in increased danger. Idi Amin, at the cost of incomparable suffering to thousands of innocent Ugandans, has presented us with the best opportunity to date to demonstrate our resolve to characterize the human rights policy of this country with concrete actions rather than mere words.

It has been said that to move against Idi Amin with trade sanctions would set a bad precedent. Such logic rings of blind indifference and an acceptance of the status quo even when there exists the most brutal forms of torture and executions. To impose sanctions on Amin does not mean that therefore we must use sanctions in the months ahead every time a patriotic leader uses disagreeable rhetoric.

We must ask what kind of precedent we set when we not only allow madmen like Idi Amin to participate in the affairs of the world community but also directly subsidize his reign of terror by supporting his economy.

I urge support for this amendment. God forbid that we be guilty of continued "silent" involvement in Idi Amin's murderous rule. If civilized nations fail to challenge the growth of barbarism and genocide, we condemn ourselves to be slowly encircled and finally engulfed by it.

Mr. President, a number of weeks ago many Americans watched the television documentary called "Holocaust." Many times afterwards I heard the questions asked, with the knowledge we have as a civilized Western World, how could we abide by the actions taken in Nazi Germany without raising more effective protest than what we did?

I am mindful that in 1939 a group of political science professors from United States leading universities and colleges visited Nazi Germany and were hosted by Adolf Hitler and given a tour. They came home, and the vast majority of these political science professors indicated it was their view that Hitler was merely trying to help the German people back on their feet.

It was very interesting, in retrospect, that so many of these things that were so evident to those very careful viewers of the scene from afar were not so evident and they were blinded when they saw them up close. In the same way certain Americans are now visiting Uganda and coming back with all kinds of apologetic stories and excuses for the regime. It seems as though sometimes these facts escape us when they are so blatant. This becomes vivid to one who gives some careful attention to the scene.

I say that because it seems to me that many times the people of this Nation are ahead of the politicians.

Let me remind the Foreign Relations Committee in reference to this particular amendment or proposal that we have been asked to substitute for Senator WEICKER's and my amendment, and which was patterned after the House of Representatives Resolution No. 612 which passed the House of Representatives on June 12, that long before June 12 the people of this Nation were becoming aware of the genocide policies of Idi Amin and were responding to a voluntary boycott that some of us launched on April 3 of this year in the Senate and even last fall in the House.

So when the Senator from Idaho gives to the Foreign Relations Committee and the action of the House of Representatives the credit and the results that have been brought about as a result of the so-called official action of Congress, I challenge that observation with simple facts that the people of this country were engaging in a voluntary boycott before Congress ever got around to acting, and the companies that were the main purchasers of Ugandan coffee were already feeling the result of that citizens' boycott, the people's boycott.

We were in communication with General Foods, Procter & Gamble, and other companies that were importing Ugandan coffee for a long period before the June 12 action by the House of Representatives. It was very evident from the communication and contacts we had with those American companies that the people's boycott was already being felt by these companies.

Mr. President, this proposal by the Foreign Relations Committee is talking about effectiveness. I think, with all due respect, it will be about as effective as instant mashed potatoes.

This is another one of those examples of rhetoric, when we really have circumstances that call for action, the kind of action that is embodied in Senator WEICKER's and my amendment.

I say that because when we talk about effectiveness let us bear in mind that the United States of America consumes about one-third of the over $500 million coffee crop now exported into the world marketplace by Idi Amin's government. That is the last of the cash crops that Amin's economy now produces. And when we consume about one-third of that, which is only about 5 percent of our total coffee consumption, it is very obvious to me that we can effect results and we will see even greater results if we can bring that one-third of his crop into total and effective boycott.

I mention that because at least one of the companies that entered into this agreement that they would boycott the coffee from Idi Amin's Uganda has, subsequent to that agreement, continued to purchase coffee through subsidiary corporations.

Our amendment would preclude that from continuing and would bring into effect a very definite boycott which would mean that we could cut one-third of Amin's crop and his cash.

I also have been in touch with the members of the British Parliament, and there is a resolution pending in the British Parliament at this time to do exactly as Senator WEICKER's and my amendment proposes in our Senate. In fact, we have word from David Owen, the British Foreign Secretary, that Parliament will follow suit should we pass this amendment.

But I do feel that we have evidence today that we can present to this body indicating that even the limited boycott that has been effected, both through the voluntary boycott and through the response from our American companies, has brought certain results that indicate a trend in Uganda.

Mr. President, we have been in direct communication with former ministers of the Ugandan Government, and with refugees from Uganda, and with those who have maintained communication with people living in Uganda. I can say unequivocally today that there is a trend downward in the political-economic life of Uganda as a result of this boycott. But it is only a half measure. We need to make the boycott effective, and complete as far as the United States is concerned That is what this amendment produces and will produce.

I think it is interesting to note that the Foreign Relations Committee indicated that they wanted to go along with the House of Representatives as if the House of Representatives found the real key to this problem.

I might say respectfully that I think probably the substitute amendment we are being asked to consider at this time is brought about from the same or similar results that happened in the House of Representatives. Let me say that the prime sponsors of the House of Representatives resolution support Senator WEICKER's and my amendment here today and they very clearly state both to us personally and for the RECORD, that the amendment they had in the House of Representatives was a watered-down version of what they really wanted. But they had jurisdictional problems they could not overcome, and this was the best product they could get. It was not at all satisfactory to the prime sponsors of the original amendments in the House of Representatives.

We talk about the various calls for human rights. I remind this body that we refused to lift the embargo on Rhodesia. We put an embargo on Rhodesian chrome and we did so in the name of human rights. Yet I wonder why this same body now, under the leadership of the Foreign Relations Committee, has only been able after all this time of hearings, study, and writing to come up with this rather half-hearted amendment to address itself to a very profound issue of genocide.

Why is it we can get so righteous and so indignant about human rights that are being violated by white regimes of Rhodesia and South Africa, and yet here we have one of two, at least to my knowlelge, one of two governments that are officially practicing genocide against its own people, Uganda and Cambodia, and why we tend to drag our feet and find all sorts of Nervous Nellie phrases to avoid facing up to the real issue and dealing with it effectively?

To me there is an element of hypocrisy in that we can apply the criterion of human rights against one particular form of government that has a certain color of skin and yet we turn in a different way and blind one eye, or half blind both eyes, as it relates to a government of a different color of skin.

It seems to me that where genocide is practiced and where human rights are in violation we should be concerned regardless of the color of the skin of the administration or the controlling political structure.

Therefore, it seems to me this body ought to be willing to lead the American people. The people in this body who are leading at this moment in the Senate should be far ahead in recognizing this horrible, murderous regime in Uganda and desiring to do something effective against it.

One last point, Mr. President, and that is it seems to me that when we look at the flexibility that the Foreign Relations Committee wants to give to the President, I am not one who wants to conduct foreign relations from the floor of the Senate. But I would like to invite the attention of the members of the Foreign Relations Committee who propose this substitute to section (c) on page 2 of Senator WEICKER's and my amendment. In that section we have deliberately set forth an element of flexibility for the President. I might say that we had the very helpful assistance from the staff of the Foreign Relations Subcommitee on African Affairs in drafting this particular section to provide that degree of flexibility for the President.

I would like to read it:

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, after date of enactment of this section, no corporation, institution, group or individual may directly or indirectly import into the United States or its territories or possessions any article grown, produced or manufactured in Uganda until the President determines and certifies to the Congress that the Government of Uganda is no longer committing gross violations of human rights.

I think anyone looking at that particular section could recognize immediately the flexibility, the character of flexibility, we have accorded the President. I want to emphasize again that this language was developed by the staff of the Subcommittee on African Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me this is a time for the Senate to develop some degree of consistency about its concern for human rights violations in the world, and we have an opportunity at this time, with Senator WEICKER's amendment, to so do as it relates to Uganda.

I would also like to add a further comment to what Senator WEICKER has already stated in response to the question by Senator HEINZ. I do not think we can afford to sit back and do nothing until we can do everything. I think we have to recognize that the answers to many of these problems, such as the global problem of human rights, have to be taken step by step, brick by brick, as we build the fortress of liberty and freedom.

For instance, I would suggest that if we wanted to include Cambodia—another country that is practicing genocide today—it would really be very difficult because we have no relationship with Cambodia.

It does not mean there will not be other vehicles, other ways, by which we can perhaps attack the problem in Cambodia. But this does give us a very distinctive opportunity to deal with a country in which we are supporting, in effect we are perpetrating, that regime by the continuing purchase of its chief export crop, coffee, because it is upon that cash crop that Amin builds his power structure.

Bear in mind that Amin has a power structure based solely upon a mercenary soldier force, and without being able to pay them off in cash regularly the loyalty of that soldier force is quickly diminished. Consequently, this does give the Senate an opportunity to act, and I am very hopeful that, when the decision is made, the Senate will support our amendment, for it is one of most effective character as compared to the mashed potatoes of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senator HODGES be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I am proud that a Congressman from my State, DONALD FEASE, a junior member of the House International Relations Committee, is the Member of Congress who has done more than any other to bring to light the facts about Uganda and about the relationships between that country and some American business concerns. Congressman PEASE has distinguished himself on this matter and it is in large measure because of his efforts that so many of us have taken a new look at this subject. I am very pleased to be joining my distinguished colleagues in the Senate, Senators WEICKER, HATFIELD, and others, as a cosponsor of this legislation.

I agree that we need mandatory legislation. It is not enough to simply indicate by the sense of the Congress what our point of view is on this subject.

Mr. President, we are fortunate to live in a world in which hundreds of millions of people have come to recognize that the fundamental human rights guaranteed until now to the citizens of only a few fortunate countries should be extended to all.

We have seen the supposedly apathetic people of India reassert their belief in democracy by overwhelmingly voting an authoritarian government out of office.

We have seen the rise of the dissident movement in the Soviet Union and we have observed with awe and admiration the fact that new people seem always to step forward to take the places of those who are driven into exile or packed off to jail by the Soviet authorities.

We have seen stirrings of freedom in the eastern European nations dominated by the Soviet Union and we have seen brave people stand up against brutal regimes in countries as diverse as South Korea, Iran, and Argentina.

But the fact is, Mr. President, that in spite of these hopeful signs, we all know that there are nations in today's world afflicted with governments that treat their own people with mindless, primitive barbarism.

The Khmer Rouge regime in Cambodia has set out to systematically annihilate whole categories of the Cambodian population and to demolish the high and ancient culture to which their country is heir.

South Africa, a nation that claims to be an outpost of western civilization, makes a mockery of our Judeo-Christian values by raising the most blatant and degrading racism to the status of official state doctrine.

And Uganda, the subject of today's debate, a beautiful country that I had the good fortune to visit probably about 18 to 20 years ago to be exact, suffers under an odious and demented despot who has presided over the massacre of hundreds of thousands of his countrymen. This admirer of Adolf Hitler and friend and supporter of international terrorism has turned loose the foreign mercenaries who keep him in power upon the Ugandan people with a license to kill, to torture, to rape, and to loot at will. His continued rule is a nightmare for Uganda, and it is a reminder to the world of the utter depravity to which the human species can sink.

The amendment before us today, of which I am proud to be a cosponsor, will at long last commit the United States to bring to an end the trade that helps to sustain the Idi Amin regime. This step—a mandatory trade embargo—will deprive Amin of the more than $248 million he derives each year from exporting coffee to this country. That $248 million amounts to more than a third of his total foreign exchange—a third of the money that he uses to pay his mercenaries, and to keep them supplied with luxury goods, Soviet weapons and Cuban advisors.

And the embargo will also deprive Amin of the limited, but valuable, access he has had to American products and American expertise. This access has been important to Amin's regime. And it has been profitable to the handful of American companies that have chosen to do business with him.

I do not think that Americans should be flying and maintaining Idi Amin's aircraft. Yet they have been doing so for the past several years.

I do not think that we should be providing Idi Amin with helicopters or that we should be training pilots for him. Yet until last fall, an American firm was doing just that.

And I do not think that an American company should be supplying Uganda with communications equipment for the use of Amin's henchmen in the army and police. Yet such an arrangement now exists.

And, Mr. President, I find it hard to believe that a number of American coffee companies, including General Foods, the producer of Maxwell House, the largest selling coffee in this country, literally have refused to join Chock Full O' Nuts. Procter & Gamble, Nestle, and other companies in a voluntary boycott of Ugandan coffee. That voluntary boycott, I am informed, has already begun to be felt in Kampala to the degree that Amin is not able to meet the bill for the fuel that Uganda imports via Kenya.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a list of other companies that have refused to stop buying Ugandan coffee be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

General Foods (Maxwell House).
E. R. Camilleri and Company.
Lonray, Inc.
Socomex Coffee Inc.
G. M. Saks Inc
S. Jackson and Son, Inc.
George William Reuff, Inc.
P. W. Bellingall Inc.
Hoty Shepston and Sciaroni.
Volkart Brothers Inc.
Bill Potts and Company.
B. A. Kahl and Company.
Loretz and Company.
Anderson-Clayton Foods.
Western States Marketing Company.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from Ohio may proceed.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, it is possible that the Amin regime will, as some have said, be able to find other markets for its coffee in the event that we eliminate our imports. On the other hand, it is also possible that our example will encourage nations like Britain, which takes 21 percent of Uganda's coffee, France, which buys 6.5 percent, and West Germany, the market for 3.5 percent, to take similar steps. Together, the United States, the European common market countries, and Japan account for approximately 80 percent of Uganda's coffee export market. If the others join in, the effect will be devastating. If they do not, our own country, at least, will have done what is manifestly the right thing.

Mr. President, the Senate refused this week to remove existing sanctions on Rhodesia until that country makes a good faith effort to reach a settlement with the parties now in opposition and move toward majority rule via truly free elections.

I believe that the Senate's judgment in this matter was sound. And I believe that the same human rights principles that led us to impose and to maintain sanctions on Rhodesia are applicable in the case of Uganda.

I do not advocate that we cut off trade with every nation with which we disagree. If we did, we might have few trading partners.

And I do not believe that embargo is necessarily the best tactic to use in most circumstances.

But in this case, Mr. President, we are not dealing with a government with which we have disagreements in policy or philosophy. We are dealing with an outlaw government, with a regime which does not belong in the company of civilized humanity, with a bloody dictatorship that deserves contempt and ostracism.

Mr. President, I know that we cannot right all of the wrongs in the world. With regard to Idi Amin, however, we can do something—and something that will hurt.

Mr. President, I regret to say that I do not believe that a sense of the Congress resolution will be sufficient to provide that kind of reaction, that kind of impact. Therefore, Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will not accept the resolution offered by the distinguished Senator from Idaho, but will instead adopt the amendment that I join the Senators from Oregon and Connecticut in offering.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I yield.

Mr. RIEGLE. I ask unanimous consent that Mark Kowalski, of my staff, be given the privilege of the floor during the remainder of the debate and any votes on this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, on behalf of Senator WEICKER and myself, I thank the Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM) for a very eloquent statement. I know of his deep concern in connection with human rights, both here and elsewhere in the world. It is certainly in keeping with his long-time reputation for standing and fighting for such considerations, and I thank him for his outstanding contribution.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER) be added as a cosponsor of Senator WEICKER's and my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I support this amendment which would impose a trade embargo against Uganda.

The present Government of Uganda is notorious for its brutal and barbaric treatment of those individuals whom it perceives as political opponents. Both public and private executions have become the standard means for dealing with political opposition since Idi Amin came to power in January of 1971. Both Ugandans and non-Ugandans have suffered the wrath of this capricious dictator.

Last November, I introduced a Senate resolution which would clearly express the sense of this body with respect to the handling of visa applications submitted by Ugandan Government officials in the future. In addition, it calls for a mandatory embargo on the export of all American military, police, and paramilitary equipment to Uganda; and it urges the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations to propose a mandatory arms embargo on Uganda by all members of the United Nations. This would, of course, parallel similar action taken by the U.N. Security Council against the Government of South Africa last fall.

A BARBARIC REGIME

Within the past several years, the world has become sadly aware of the unspeakable horrors of the Amin regime in Uganda. The rule of law in Uganda is nonexistent, and financial mismanagement is widespread. Idi Amin has declared himself "president for life" and has undertaken a bloody campaign to eliminate all potential opposition to his totalitarian government. The official intelligence network within the country constitutes a continuous form of harassment and intimidation for Ugandans in all walks of life.

Estimates of the number of Ugandan citizens who have been mercilessly killed since Amin came to power vary, but amnesty international reports that between 30,000 and 300,000 Ugandans have fallen victim to this reign of terror.

In addition, we know that American businessmen and church leaders residing in Uganda have been harassed and intimidated unmercifully. Discrimination against Christians and Jews has occurred regularly. For a few days in February of 1977, Amin forbade Americans living in Uganda from leaving the country. A concerted international protest fortunately led to a rescission of that order.

SOVIET AND CUBAN INVOLVEMENT

In search of a source of diplomatic and military support, Idi Amin has turned to the Soviet Union for the purchase of fighter aircraft and tanks as well as Soviet instructors to accompany them. Amin's closest friends on the international scene are the leaders of Cuba and Libya, both international outlaws in their own right. Newspapers in neighboring Kenya have reported that large numbers of Cubans are entering Uganda, and Libya is providing Uganda with economic aid. It will not come as a surprise to many that the brutal Ugandan regime displays a definite pro-Marxist tendency in its foreign relations.

PURPOSE OF RESOLUTION

Mr. President, there are those who shrug their shoulders helplessly and say that there is little we can do to improve the barbaric situations that we know exist in nations such as Cambodia and Uganda today. But I do not subscribe to the theory that our limited capacities necessitate hopeless resignation on our part. I believe that the U.S. Government has a responsibility to speak out, and to continue to speak out against such brutal regimes, and to attempt to focus world attention on their gross violations of basic human rights.

In many cases, our action may be termed "symbolic" or "moralistic." In some cases, when we move to deny technical and military assistance to Uganda, others may fill the void. But I, for one, believe that moral principle and consistency of policy argue for such action in any case. Indeed, I believe the national interest is best served by a policy that encourages the isolation of repressive governments and by the termination of assistance that directly strengthens the means of repression.

At this time, I believe it is more important that the U.S. Senate go beyond a simple expression of condemnation for the oppressive Ugandan Government. I believe all of us should support this trade embargo against Uganda, restricting certain exports as well as imports.

Mr. President, I believe the effort by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut and the distinguished Senator from Oregon deserves the suport of all Members of this body. Some time later during the course of the consideration of this measure, the Senator from Kansas will offer yet another amendment, which would direct the President of the United States to instruct our Nation's Executive Director to the International Monetary Fund to oppose any funding to Cambodia or Uganda through the supplemental facility addressed by this legislation. That will be another effort, and I hope an appropriate effort, and a proper response to the atrocities we see in Uganda and the genocide we see in Cambodia.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I shall be brief.

I do not think anyone could question my support for and sympathy with the principles which Senator WEICKER is espousing and which he has sedulously pursued, and which I join with the others in praising.

My problem is that I shall be a conferee in a difficult conference, which will face the following proposition: This is a trade matter. It is not within the jurisdiction of either the Foreign Relations Committee or the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs. Nor will we be conferring with the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives. I have profound concern that it will be knocked out on a point of order in respect of what goes on on the House floor.

Therefore, in this matter—and I think, aside from Senator PROXMIRE, I am the most ardent advocate of the Genocide Treaty on this floor, and have been for years—I believe I would rather do something than nothing. The House of Representatives has adopted the resolution which Senator CHURCH has proposed as a substitute. I believe with Senator CHURCH that this will be very eloquent notice to the President that, whether on this bill or some other bill, we will put on an embargo, as we have on Cuba and as we have in other situations we felt strongly about, on a proper bill, a bill out of Senator CURTIS' and Senator LONG's committee. There are plenty of them to come up yet. I believe that is the proper course.

If the President does not get the message, then I think we have plenty of opportunity to act in a summary way. But I believe our zeal may mislead us in this particular situation.

That is the first point.

Secondly, I would like to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he thinks that his own terms are too strict in terms of the ability of the United States to deal with situations. For example, he says that the embargo, and it is an absolute embargo which would be imposed, other than food, is conditioned upon the President certifying to the Congress that the Government of Uganda, "is no longer committing gross violations of human rights."

Well, gross violations of human rights could be committed on one person.

I would have thought that some flexibility, in a case like this, when we do not know what could happen, what the situation would be in Africa, would read, "Until he certifies to the Congress that the national interest requires" some other action. I think in a case like this, that would be shooting a big weapon, a necessary precaution.

For all those reasons, that is, that I would rather do something rather than nothing, I find, notwithstanding my deep feelings about this matter, that I must stand with Senator CHURCH in respect of advocating to the Senate the substitute.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I would like to respond to the Senator from New York. I understand his concern and we anticipated it. We checked with the House Parliamentarian on this question he raises as to the conference committee with the House and the whole procedure. The House Parliamentarian informed us that there would be no germaneness problem if this amendment were attached to this bill. He indicated that if someone should raise a point of order in the House of Representatives, they would merely separate the amendment and vote on the amendment separately. The chief sponsors of the amendment in the House of Representatives are urging that we take this action, feeling very confident that they can handle it in that manner, according to the ruling by the House Parliamentarian.

As to the second point raised relating to section C of our amendment, again I reiterate that we had difficulty in drafting that particular section. We wanted the finest help and assistance we felt to be available. We went to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. We went to the Subcommittee on African Affairs. The staff of that Subcommittee on African Affairs, of the Senator's committee, assisted us and, in fact, did the primary wording for us.

I feel we have therefore at least looked to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for the kind of assistance and help it is so expert in and we have, therefore, the language that perhaps is the best that we can devise at this time.

I am sure that Senator WEICKER and I are not locked into any nomenclature or glossary of words. We are trying to convey an idea. We are trying to establish a concept of flexibility for the President.

I merely wanted to state for the record again that we looked to the committee of the Senator from New York and the Subcommittee on African Affairs for that kind of wording.

Mr. JAVITS. If the Senator will yield, I will reply.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. As to the first question, our information is to the contrary. That sometimes happens. It depends on what Parliamentarian you get.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. From the same Parliamentarian?

Mr. JAVITS. I am not going to quote anybody.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. I wanted to get a source. If it is a higher source, I want the source.

Mr. JAVITS. All I will say is that our information is not in accord with the Senator's information on this issue of germaneness or point of order. That is all I wish to say. The Senator's statement stands and so does mine. I am not trying to debate the Senator or contradict him. I just say that our information is to the contrary.

As to the second point, as far as the language is concerned, we will have to deal with that when we come to it. We are not at that point now. We have a substitute which is proposed and that substitute may be tabled, as I understand Senator WEICKER is going to move to table it. Then we will debate that issue.

I do believe, and I think it is very established practice here, and I yield to no one in respect to my respect for my friend (Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD), that when you have the help of the subcommittee staff that does not represent the action of the subcommittee. I have never heard about this. I do not know about other members of the African Subcommittee. Generally, staff will oblige any Senator, and it is their duty, I believe, when he asks them to do something. If a Senator tells them what he would like done, they will tell him how to do it. That does not mean that the subcommittee or the committee is committed to that formulation. So I felt free to make the point which I made. I do not think it is invalidated by the fact that the staff of a subcommittee has helped the Senators in drawing up their amendment, as indeed they should.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senator THURMOND be added as a cosponsor, and I ask unanimous consent that James Lockemy of Senator THURMOND's staff be granted the privileges of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SARBANES). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, unless others wish to be heard, I move to table the substitute amendment offered by Senator CHURCH and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the Church substitute amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN), the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. EASTLAND), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), the Senator from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. MCINTYRE), the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH), and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), and the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON) would each vote "nay."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) would vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD), the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE) would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 30, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 260 Leg.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I say to the Senator from New York, the Senator from Oregon sought recognition and was recognized before the Senator.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I was on my feet seeking recognition. It does not matter, if the Senator wishes to be recognized.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to table was agreed to.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs——

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1535, AS MODIFIED

(Purpose: To impose a trade embargo against Uganda)

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to amend our amendment on page 2, to include the words: a consistent pattern of gross violations of human rights.

During the debate on the previous amendment, the Senator from New York raised the question about some tightening of the criteria as to when the President would certify that such actions had ceased to be taking place.

Consequently, I am offering this amendment to tighten the criteria on that authority of the President.

Mr. HEINZ. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do Senators agree to the amendment——

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend for a moment? The Senate is not in session—I mean, is not in order.

[Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so close to not being in order, it is almost out of session.

Would members please take their seats and clear the well?

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Members will please clear the aisles and take their seats.

The Senator from Pennsylvania reserves the right to object to the unanimous consent request.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Oregon if I understand his request correctly. Does he seek to amend both section (c) and section (d) on page 2 and page 3, both?

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Yes, exactly. I ask that as part of my unanimous consent request.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Will the Senator please send the modification to the desk?

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

SEC. 3. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the Government of Uganda, under the regime of General Idi Amin, has committed genocide against Ugandans;

(2) the United States maintains substantial trade with the Republic of Uganda; and

(3) the relationship of the United States with Uganda is unique and justifies an exceptional response by the United States to the actions of the Government of Uganda.

(b) It is the sense of the Congress that the Government of the United States should take steps to disassociate itself from any foreign government which engages in the international crime of genocide.

(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, after date of enactment of this section, no corporation, institution, group or individual may import, directly or indirectly, into the United States or its territories or possessions any article grown, produced, or manufactured in Uganda until the President determines and certifies to the Congress that the Government of Uganda is no longer committing a consistant pattern of gross violations of human rights.

(d) Section 4 of the Export Administration Act of 1969 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "(m) No article, material, or supply, including technical data or other information, other than cereal grains and additional food products, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States or exported by any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, may be exported to Uganda until the President determines and certifies to the Congress that the Government of Uganda is no longer committing a consistant pattern of gross violations of human rights."

(e) The Congress directs the President to encourage and support international actions, including economic restrictions, to respond to conditions in the Republic of Uganda.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I think it is a fine change and, in view of the expressed will of the Senate, I expect to vote for the amendment.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. CHURCH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the reason I offered the substitute in the first place was that I believed that by adopting the same action the House had taken and joining hands with the House in the sense of the Congress resolution, we would urge upon the President a course of action which would enable him to negotiate with other countries in a way to make the embargo effective.

Our hearings showed that a unilateral embargo on the part of the United States would not prove effective since other Ugandan customers, such as the Europeans, would simply increase their purchases, and we would not achieve our objective.

But the Senate has chosen differently, and I fully subscribe to the objective sought by the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Oregon.

Both Senators appeared as very effective witnesses at those hearings I conducted. There is no question in my mind but that the Idi Amin regime is not entitled to any kind of relationship with civilized countries and that that regime is now sustained, at least partly, by the trade between Uganda and the United States, which would be cut off if this amendment were adopted.

I subscribe to the objective of the amendment. I would hope the Senate would now, by a rollcall vote, overwhelmingly approve the amendment.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, to establish the clear intent of this effort, one of the purposes of our amendment as drafted is to address both U.S. corporations and their foreign subsidiaries and to prevent second- and third-party purchases. This was the reason that we included the terms "directly or indirectly" in paragraph (c).

PUT TEETH IN UGANDA EMBARGO

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President thanks to the efforts of our distinguished colleagues from Oregon and Connecticut, we now have the opportnuity to practice what we preach in the area of human rights. For the first time, we have a vehicle with which to effect material change in a country whose institutionalized brutality knows few parallels in the modern world.

For years, this Nation, and other nations around the world have stood by in silence, often more amused by the comical antics of Idi Amin than horrified by his reign of terror. Whether madman or comic, Amin has regrettably succeeded in convincing the world community not to take him seriously.

But it is high time that we stop this tragic farce. It is time for us to stop looking at Amin the clown and start acting against Amin the butcher.

The fact is, we are witnessing, much as we did some 40 years ago. a holocaust. At the direction of Amin, as many as 150,000 people have been killed in the most barbaric and capricious fashion.

When the self-professed admirer of Adolf Hitler first came to power in 1970, he boasted that his coup had been bloodless. Indeed it had. But with the slaughter of the bulk of his armed forces during his first year as dictator, the pattern of bloodshed for years to come was set.

Has the Ugandan nightmare changed during the past few years? The answer is clearly no. Testimony by the International Commission of Jurists and Amnesty International indicates that if anything, the situation has worsened. Now, poor farmers in the countryside, once relatively secure, are just as likely to suffer death and torture as urban dwellers.

Still, during the past few months, with the fabric of Ugandan society unraveling around him, General Amin has been unusually silent. To what can we attribute this highly uncharacteristic behavior?

Mr. President, I do not think there is any doubt that recent actions by Congress and by American coffee companies have seriously shaken the confidence of General Amin. After all, he is hardly accustomed to such a reaction by his once passive spectators. He does not expect this Nation to act any differently than do the United Nations or the Organization of African Unity, both of which have failed to even censure Amin.

But the United States, I am proud to say, has not remained in the shadow of indifference and passivity that have characterized the responses of other nations. Already, the House of Representatives has passed a unanimous resolution urging the President to support and implement a trade embargo against Uganda. Sixty members of Congress have echoed that proposal in a special letter to President Carter.

Now, however, we can give our verbal resolve some teeth. We can show our support for those coffee companies that have voluntarily stopped buying Ugandan beans. More importantly, we can end the hypocrisy that inevitably attends a situation in which we criticize Idi Amin while providing him with financial and technical support with which to continue his savage rule.

We are all well aware that the United States can wield significant influence over the Ugandan economy through its large purchases of coffee beans—that country's only significant export. We also know that Amin's regime of fear is heavily dependent on coffee revenues, since fully 95 percent of his armed forces are mercenaries who are loyal only so long as Amin pays them in hard currency. In short, there are few situations where economic sanctions would prove as effective as in the case of Uganda.

The vital question facing us here today is whether we wish to remain the No. 1 source of financial support for a man who can only maintain power through systematic genocide. Quite frankly, I do not consider this a terribly controversial question. I believe that failure to act on this amendment not only undermines the consistency of American ideals and American foreign policy, but also serves as a callous rebuff to those oppressed peoples around the world who look for us to provide leadership in human rights.

I am sympathetic to the concerns of those who would argue that it is unwise to use trade restrictions for political purposes. Under ordinary circumstances, I would oppose any measure that impaired free trade for political purposes. But circumstances in Uganda are far from ordinary, and I think we would be extraordinarily derelict in our duty if we did not recognize that American free enterprise must contain a moral component in such instances.

It is folly to continue to talk about preserving the so-called "two track" division between politics and economics when the subject is Uganda. For in this case, the two are inseparable. At this very moment, our economic actions are having profound political consequences. We are continuing to purchase coffee and indirectly support genocide.

Dare we persist in our role as chief conspirator in the slaughter of thousands of Ugandan citizens? Dare we let ourselves be associated with the defilement of the magnificent beauty of Uganda and its citizens? Let us not repeat the past. Let us not again blemish the conscience of our Nation as we did through our early support of Adolf Hitler.

Once again we are faced with a moral choice. We should not be implicated by our silence.

Mr. CHURCH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER The yeas and nays have already been ordered.

The question is on agreeing to UP amendment No. 1535 of the Senator from Connecticut, as modified. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment and the clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS), the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. EASTLAND), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), the Senator from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. MCINTYRE), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS), the Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE), and the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. HODGES), are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), and the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), would each vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD), the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE) would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 73, nays 1, as follows:

So Mr. WEICKER's amendment (UP No. 5153), as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 3101

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 3101 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER) for himself, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. YOUNG, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. BROOKE, Mr. MUSKIE, and Mr. BELLMON, proposes amendment numbered 3101.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 3, line 9, strike out the quotation marks and period at the end of the line.

On page 3, between lines 9 and 10, insert the following:

"(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, the authority of the Secretary to enter into agreements making resources available under this section shall be limited to such amounts as are appropriated in advance in appropriation Acts. Effective October 1, 1978, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of the Treasury, without fiscal year limitation, such sums as are necessary to carry out subsection (a) of this section, but not to exceed an amount of dollars equivalent to 1,450 million Special Drawing Rights.".

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following Senators be added as cosponsors of my amendment: Senator HELMS, of North Carolina; Senator CHILES, of Florida; Senator MCCLURE, of Idaho; Senator WEICKER, of Connecticut; Senator HARRY F. BYRD, JR., of Virginia; Senator ABOUREZK, of South Dakota; Senator STEVENS, of Alaska; and Senator BURDICK, of North Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, in addition, the prime sponsors of my amendment include Senator INOUYE, the chairman of the Foreign Operations Appropriations Subcommittee, on which I serve; Senator MAGNUSON, the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee; Senator YOUNG, the ranking member of the Appropriations Committee; Senator PROXMIRE, chairman of the Banking Committee; Senator BROOKE, the ranking member of the Banking Committee; Senator MUSKIE, the chairman of the Budget Committee; and Senator BELLMON, the ranking member of the Budget Committee.

I think the reason for this rather important and prestigious group of sponsors is because this amendment corrects a serious deficiency in the bill as it was reported by the committee. Simply, the Schweicker amendment would require that any funds provided for U.S. participation in the Witteveen facility must be wholly appropriated in advance.

Before discussing the merits of my amendment, I express my deep appreciation to the chairman of the Foreign Operations Appropriation Subcommittee, and the chairmen and ranking members of the Appropriations, Banking and Budget Committees, whose names I have just mentioned, for their support and interest in this amendment.

These individuals have been consistent in trying to insure that the Budget Act continues to be a strong fiscal and budgetary tool of Congress. In addition, I would like to especially commend Senator MUSKIE and the Budget Committee for the excellent work they did on this matter when we considered the first budget resolution. Because of their diligence, $1.8 billion is included in the first budget resolution to cover the full appropriation needed for U.S. participation in the facility.

Mr. President, in anticipation of arguments which may be made against this amendment, and some of which already have been made, even though my amendment had not been called up, I believe it would be worthwhile to discuss both those issues and the background of this legislation. The administration's original version of this legislation did not provide for any appropriation, despite the fact that under this bill the United States would outlay $1.8 billion to the Whitteveen facility. Their argument was that because this is an exchange of monetary assets, appropriation of funds were not necessary. The Foreign Relations Committee reported the administration's bill. When the legislation was considered by the Banking Committee, Senator PROXMIRE offered an amendment cosponsored by Senator BROOKE which would have brought the facility under the appropriations and budget process. Senator PROXMIRE withdrew his amendment and both he and Senator BROOKE presently support the position I am making that funds for the facility must be wholly appropriated.

Mr. President, the bill, as reported, is subject to a point of order under section 401(a) of the Budget Act. This section was enacted to stop so-called "backdoor spending" legislation which previously circumvented the appropriation process. S. 2152 involves "contract authority" within the meaning of the Budget Act, because the United States would enter into a contractual arrangement to participate in the facility. That contract would obligate the United States to make outlays to meet its commitment. While the House legislation contains language which would bring the facility under the appropriation process, it is at best vague, and does not require that funds for the facility be wholly appropriated. The Budget Committee has correctly determined that commitments authorized by this legislation fall within the definition of budget authority and, therefore, the entire $1.8 billion should be appropriated. Any other approach than that taken by my amendment only fuzzes the issue and abrogates the process.

Mr. President, as I mentioned earlier, the administration's original proposal was to treat U.S. participation in the facility as an exchange of monetary assets not requiring appropriations. They have made a separate proposal, not contained in this legislation, which would provide $200 million for possible exchange valuation losses when the SDR-denominated contribution to the IMF is repaid in dollars. This proposal, which was a fiscal year 1978 supplemental request, was not even considered by the House of Representatives in passing the second supplemental appropriation bill for fiscal year 1978, and I can safely state that the Senate Appropriations Committee will take similar action. That is why the chairman of our committee is a sponsor, as well as the ranking Republican.

Mr. President, there are several defects in the exchange of assets arguments advanced by the administration. First, the asset we get for the funds contributed to the facility is restricted and not as readily usable as the funds put in. Second, Treasury will have to finance the U.S. contribution either by borrowing in the Government securities market or from tax revenues. Third, the United States does not acquire a completely liquid asset in return for its contribution to the IMF. Indeed, the special drawing rights it acquires can only be redeemed in dollars with the approval of the IMF. Only upon representation by our Government that it has a legitimate balance of payments need, and only with the approval of the IMF would it be possible for us to draw from the fund.

The point here is that legally we do not have a claim on retrieving our funds without specific IMF approval under specific IMF conditions.

Fourth, and I believe the most important point, is that if the exchange of asset argument were carried to its logical conclusion, Congress would lose complete control over the budget. There are several areas which have been mentioned where an exchange of assets concept might apply under the reasoning represented in this bill. Under the reasoning propounded by Treasury, banks could be set up to finance urban or energy development wherein Treasury would deposit funds in that bank and in return receive a certificate of deposit. The bank would then have the use of U.S. funds which Treasury could treat as assets on deposit at the bank. This would mean we would not have to appropriate that money either. As Senator PROXMIRE pointed out in a letter to me concerning this subject, the potential of this new form for "backdoor spending" is almost unlimited. Why, under Treasury's reasoning, could not Government acquisition of strategic petroleum reserves—they have a very high monetary value. We could easily put up a certificate of deposit exchanged under some conditions in the future when they were sold—or timberlands which have a value, too, or recreational lands or almost any transaction where the Government acquires an asset, could come under this exchange of assets concept, thereby avoiding the appropriation and budget process. In fact, I think it could be forceably argued that such assets would be more valuable and liquid than the assets we would acquire under this legislation.

The bill, without my amendment, would make a mockery out of the budget process and the appropriation process.

Mr. President, the administration has indicated their strong wish for passage of the Witteveen facility legislation. While the administration continues its desire to treat this legislation off-budget—or outside budget, they have indicated that because they feel it is important to enact this bill soon, they will not fight the passage of my amendment. I earnestly hope that the managers of this bill will see this amendment as a genuine attempt to strengthen and preserve the Budget Act. If the amendment is passed by the Senate, I feel certain that the President can anticipate it in a relatively short period of time.

Mr. President, again I would like to thank the cosponsors for their help on this amendment and I urge my colleagues to accept it.

I see the chairman, the distinguished chairman, of our committee, has risen, and I will be glad to yield to him without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I want to suggest, too, that there is another reason for this amendment. The Office of Management and Budget has fallen into the habit, which I do not think they should have but they do, to list all loans as expenditures. As a matter of fact, if you took all loans out of the budget and listed them as assets, which they are, you would come pretty close to balancing the budget. There are billions of dollars worth of loans that are listed as expenditures. It is true they have to go out and borrow the money to make the expenditure. As long as the Appropriations Committee is taking the responsibility, the praise or the criticism, whatever it may be, for expenditures, I think we ought to take a look at some of these things that would be involved in this particular operation.

That is one of the reasons why I so strongly support the amendment, since if something happens we are going to be the ones who are going to be accused of not taking a look at some of these things as long as they are listed as expenditures and not as assets.

Any business that has a good loan never lists it as a debit. They list it as an asset. When they talk about balancing budgets we are running up into somewhere around $40 billion worth of loans that are listed as expenditures and debits in the budget.

If you took those out, you might say, "I have a balanced budget." Of course, one of the problems is that the Treasury does have to go and borrow money to make the loan. When they do, they dip into the private sector supply of money available and that, in turn, causes interest rates to rise and inflation. But I think it ought to be clear—and I assume that the Committee on Foreign Relations has looked upon this operation as good solid loans. There have not been any defaults.

Mr. CHURCH. That is correct.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I do not know why the Office of Management and Budget continues to put this down as part of expenditures and part of a deficit in the budget. There is not that big a deficit if you take care of that particular bookkeeping item.

That is why I support the amendment, other than the other basic purposes the Senator from Pennsylvania has put forth.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I wish to comment on Senator MAGNUSON's point. He has made a very significant point for all of us. Look what is happening with this imbalanced budget. The dollar is sliding because we have a $50 billion deficit and sliding disastrously. The American people are going to feel it very hard very soon because we have to buy a lot of things to keep this industrial machine working, and the imbalance in terms of our exports and imports weigh in two and three times the reason they should because they are built upon an imbalanced budget.

The bookkeeping is crazy, and for this reason. The very people who are insisting upon that kind of bookkeeping, Senator MAGNUSON, say we have to run a business government. Do you see General Motors or General Electric or United States Steel running its business the way you just said? Sure, they go out and borrow money, but they carry it as a perfectly good asset when they have a loan and it is not what you owe, it is what you have against what you owe. The fact is that even the national debt is low compared to our gross national product in terms of previous years.

I will deal with the amendment later, but I just felt this was so pertinent to our national situation that it is really tragic that this President, who wants to reform everything—and I think the Senator has a good deal of influence on him—I do not see why he should not reform that.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, if any business kept books the way we keep books, I think the SEC would put them in jail. I am sure of that. But we technically go down to the till theoretically this year on September 30 at midnight. We open the Federal till and we look in. If there are some I O U's in there, perfectly good I O U's, that is part of the deficit. If there is a little cash in there, that is the surplus. Then we close the till and go about our business for another year.

No one could do business that way any place, and some of the people who will be beneficiaries of these loans are the ones who are criticizing us.

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly right.

Mr. MAGNUSON. That is why we should take a look at it.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. I thank the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that a statement by the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG), the ranking Republican member on the Appropriations Committee, strongly in support of the Schweiker amendment, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR YOUNG

I would like to reiterate my strong support for the amendment being offered by Senator Schweiker which I have co-sponsored.

Since the passage of the Budget Act those of us who have a particular responsibility regarding that Act have consistently sought to insure that legislation containing "backdoor spending" not be enacted. In some cases this has been a painful process, but we must do all we can to make sure that the Budget Act continues to be a viable mechanism for budget control.

This effort will have to continue and this amendment simply represents another attempt to make sure that our own processes are not violated. I would like to commend the Senator from Pennsylvania and the rest of the co-sponsors of this amendment for their diligence in this matter, and I hope the Senate will clearly see the necessity of passing this amendment.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. I also ask unanimous consent that a statement by the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), the ranking Republican member on the Banking Committee and also, I might say, a member of my subcommittee which will be appropriating the money for this amendment, which statement is also strongly in support of the Schweiker amendment, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR BROOKE

We have before us S. 2152, a bill which would authorize the United States to participate in the IMF Witteveen Facility. This facility would provide the IMF with approximately $10.5 billion worth of hard currencies (our share—about $1.75 billion) which would be used to assist countries experiencing severe balance of payments difficulties and would, therefore, help to strengthen the international monetary system. I support U.S. participation in this facility.

I am deeply concerned, though, that the bill, as reported, constitutes an "end run" of the budget process and violates Section 401 (a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 by authorizing the Treasury to make contributions to the facility without requiring that the funds be provided in advance in an appropriations act.

U.S. participation in the Witteveen facility will obligate the Treasury, on call, to obtain funds to be transferred to the IMF either by going to the capital markets or by utilizing tax revenues. This type of commitment constitutes a binding contract obligating the U.S. to make budgetary outlays. And Section 401(a) of the Budget Act specifically provides that legislation authorizing such contracts to make outlays be limited to amounts provided in advance in an appropriations act.

The Treasury has attempted to justify this off-budget treatment of U.S. contributions to the facility by arguing that these contributions represent merely an "exchange of monetary assets". This argument is based upon the premise that the U.S. receives, in exchange for each dollar contribution, an equivalent reserve claim on the IMF, denominated in Standard Drawing Rights (SDRs), that is highly liquid and thus similar to a bank deposit. We are asked to believe therefore, that such a transaction does not really involve an "outlay" of funds, only an exchange of monetary assets, and should not be included in the budget.

This "exchange of assets" argument, though, ignores two major important points.

First, the Treasury will be obligated to finance U.S. contributions to the IMF either by borrowing in the capital markets or drawing upon tax revenues. As a consequence, these contributions would have the equivalent impact on our domestic credit markets and economy as would direct expenditures for any current program and thus should, logically, compete with all other Federal outlays reflected in the budget.

Second, the asset acquired by the Treasury in exchange for contributions to the facility is not as liquid as the Treasury would have us believe. It can only be redeemed with prior IMF approval and if the U.S. can represent to the IMF a legitimate balance of payments need. Although the Treasury argues that the U.S. would be given the "overwhelming benefit of the doubt" by the IMF in these situations, it is a fact that legally we cannot act without the prior approval of the IMF. Furthermore while mortgage loans and similar financial instruments acquired by the federal government can be liquidated without requiring the approval of another organization and are thus even more liquid than an SDR-denominated reserve claim, their acquisition is treated as a budgetary outlay.

My distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania, Senator Schweiker has introduced an amendment which would require that the amount to be committed to in this facility be approved in advance in an appropriation act. I have cosponsored this amendment along with Senators Inouye, Magnuson, Young, Proxmire, Muskie, and Bellmon, and I strongly urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

As I stated previously, I support U.S. participation in the Witteveen Facility. The United States would benefit as a result of the stabilizing and strengthening effect that the implementation of this facility would have on the international monetary system. I am convinced, however, that the decision to participate in the facility must be made in conjunction with the budget and appropriations processes.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield the floor at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I do not agree with all of the arguments that have been made by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania in behalf of his amendment. Earlier I stated the position of the Foreign Relations Committee. I believe the distinguished Senator from Illinois has stated the position of the Banking Committee. The Senator from New York earlier made a very fine statement laying out the general position of the managers of the bill.

However, the Chair has already indicated that it would support a point of order, if raised, against the bill as it now stands, and I see no reason why we should prolong the debate and possibly jeopardize the bill itself by engaging in an argument that essentially deals with internal bookkeeping here in the Senate, an argument that does not go to the merits of the bill at all.

I must also say, in all candor, that Senator STEVENSON, Senator JAVITS, Senator HEINZ, and I have been standing on top of a hill since 11 o'clock this morning, watching an army of Senators gathering in the field below, under the banners of MAGNUSON, SCHWEIKER, and MUSKIE. That army is obviously growing in size with every passing hour. Under these circumstances discretion may be the better part of valor. So we have decided to yield the heights and join the imposing host in the field below * * * not for the purpose of establishing precedents that might govern in the future, but for the purpose of facilitating this bill. In order to expedite the business of the Senate, we are prepared to accept the amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, I am happy to yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, as the distinguished Senator from Idaho indicated, the managers have said their piece. I do not intend to repeat mine. I cannot accept the reasoning of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, but I am prepared to accept this amendment with respect to the Witteveen Facility if the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania and perhaps others can give us some reason to believe that, having accepted it, the Appropriations Committee, and perhaps the distinguished chairman of that committee would comment, will act in the near future, and favorably, on an appropriation of the full amount for U.S. participation in the Witteveen Facility.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Senators should remember that this is an all or nothing proposition. I think that ought to be clear. It is not a matter of quantitative judgment; either we do it or we do not.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; I think the Senator is right to make that point. If we are not successful in assuring our participation in the amount that has been negotiated for U.S. participation in the Witteveen Facility, it falls; it is dead.

Mr. JAVITS. It falls apart. And it should be remembered that this is the "biggie" we get out of the International Monetary Fund. Saudi Arabia is in this one for 25 percent.

Mr. MAGNUSON. If the Senator will yield, I am sure the Senator from Pennsylvania will understand we do have to take the limit.

Mr. JAVITS. Either we are in the deal or we are not.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I can assure you we will vote expeditiously on this matter, and not stall it in any way because of some feeling someone might have about some of the things that might be involved; because we are still the money committee, and we have to take this or put it down. I think we can do it, and do it very quickly.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator for that assurance.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, if I may respond on behalf of our subcommittee, I want to give the same assurance, because Senator INOUYE has been very much interested in this. As chairman of the subcommittee under Senator MAGNUSON, he has already given that assurance.

I have a letter from Senator INOUYE to Under Secretary of the Treasury, the Honorable Anthony Solomon, who says he will do everything he can to undertake the matter and do it with great dispatch. So we have his assurance, and the assurance of my subcommittee. I will support the full amount, and I believe the Republicans on my subcommittee, Senator BROOKE, Senator HATFIELD, and Senator MATHIAS, also feel the same way. So we have every expectation that we will be forthcoming with the full amount.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on the assurances given by those Senators, and I have expressed my views heretofore on the point made by Senator MCCLURE, I find the amendment acceptable, and join with the other Senators in supporting it.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I am much impressed with the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER) when he presented this amendment——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so I can get the yeas and nays?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SASSER). Is there a sufficient second?

Mr. PROXMIRE. If I cannot get them now, I am going to get them if I have to stay here all day and all day Monday.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I will join with Senator PROXMIRE in that effort.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I was much impressed with the opening statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER) when he presented this amendment. I think this is a vitally important amendment.

The Senator from Pennsylvania outlined the reasons for the amendment. The reasons, in my judgment, are sound. The Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE) earlier had outlined the reasons for the amendment.

It is vitually important that this policy be established.

If the Senator from Wisconsin had not asked for the yeas and nays, my purpose in rising now was to ask for the yeas and nays.

I think there should be a showdown in the Senate on this matter. This thing of the Senate continually going off the budget and avoiding the appropriations process does not appeal to the Senator from Virginia, and I am happy to join with the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER) and the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE) in supporting the amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I rise for only one purpose, and that is to ask the Senator from Maine a question.

Is it not a fact that this amendment is contained in the budget for 1979 at $1.8 billion?

Mr. MUSKIE. Yes, it is in the congressional budget for 1979, and we were able to persuade the House conferees to accept the Senate provision.

In other words, there has never been any challenge as to the amount needed; there has only been a challenge on the off-budget/on-budget issue, and that, I take it, will be resolved by the passage of this amendment later this afternoon.

Mr. JAVITS. I just wanted to be sure on the matter regarding the budget.

Mr. MUSKIE. I had wondered how much I should add to the dialog.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, being mindful of the hour and the mood of the Senate, I want to be very brief but I do want to make some comments on what the Senator from Idaho said about the gathering army, the trumpeter having sounded the charge, and then being ready to fall back and regroup. If the Schweiker amendment is adopted, as appears likely, there would be no reason for me to raise the point of order, and I would not attempt to raise the point of order in the event the Schweiker amendment is agreed to.

● Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, I join my friend the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee, Senator MUSKIE, in his support for the Schweiker amendment. The conference report on the first concurrent resolution made specific reference to the Witteveen Facility and indicated the need for proper accounting. The report stated:

> The conference substitute includes $1.8 billion in Budget Authority above the House resolution only to provide for the possibility that implementation of the Witteveen Facility of the International Monetary Fund will be delayed until fiscal year 1979 and that the entire amount will be appropriated.

Those who indicate that the Witteveen Facility should be fully funded and yet resist an appropriation of budget authority compatible with full funding ask us to accept an internally inconsistent thesis and in so doing violate the provisions against backdoor spending as contained in section 401 of the Budget Act. They believe that smaller is better. In a budgetary sense, I, too, would share that view on most occasions. A budget, however, should tell it like it is. The Witteveen Facility represents a $1.8 billion commitment of resources by the Treasury and should be appropriated and budgeted as such.

The Foreign Relations Committee maintains the position that payments to the IMF are like deposits in a bank, where Treasury funds are kept pursuant to withdrawal. Therefore, they contend that these payments are not expenditures but merely an "exchange of monetary assets."

In short, they would lead us to believe that a special drawing right (SDR) is like a certificate of deposit (CD) for Treasury funds at the Riggs Bank. Nothing could be further from the truth. The CD is liquid while the SDR can be redeemed only to the extent that the IMF asserts that the United States is in a severe balance-of-payments position and some other country is willing to accept the SDR for its own currency.

Aside from the merits of the Witteveen Facility itself, the exchange of assets concept poses substantial problems as a precedent for future financing activities. Under the reasoning advanced by the Treasury, it would be possible to set up a bank to finance some activity such as energy development or urban development, for example. The Treasury could then deposit in the bank such sums as it deemed appropriate and obtain in return a certificate of deposit. The bank would have the use of U.S. funds, which the Treasury would treat as assets on deposit in the bank. And all this could be accomplished without Congressional approval. The potential for this technique as a new form of back-door spending is almost unlimited.

In addition to an appropriation of $1.8 billion to create the facility, we should provide for the potential losses which will arise with dollar appreciation over the 7-year period. I am pleased to note that the sponsors of S. 2152 appear willing to provide for that contingency.

The precedent which we will establish here today is an important one. I trust that the Senate, while it desires a smaller budget, demands a truthful one.●

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS), the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. EASTLAND), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD), the Senator from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. HODGES), the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. HUDDLESTON), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. MCINTYRE), the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS), and the Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senators from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON and Mrs. HUMPHREY) would each vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN), the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD), the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE) and the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) would each vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 67, nays 0, as follows:

So Mr. SCHWEIKER's amendment (No. 3101) was agreed to.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JAVITS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a member of my staff, Pat Chastka, be granted privilege of the floor during consideration and votes on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mrs. Gwenn King of my staff be granted privilege of the floor during the consideration of this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DURKIN. Mr. President, a similar request for Robert Lawrence of my staff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator from Idaho, the manager of the bill, is willing, I would like to address several questions to him in connection with the bill.

May I ask the distinguished manager of the bill what countries are likely to be beneficiaries of this legislation?

Mr. HEINZ. If I might respond to the Senator from Virginia, any country that is a member in good standing of the International Monetary Fund, and which has met the three conditions for participation, may seek assistance and get assistance from the International Monetary Fund. These conditions are that the country must: have need of the kind of financing provided by the International Monetary Fund; have lived up to its commitments as indicated in the quota increases; and have agreed to the necessary conditions to bring its economy into appropriate compliance with any conditions set by the International Monetary Fund.

But in order to receive assistance it must be a participant and it must meet all the needs criteria and, depending on the kind and quality of its needs, be willing to take necessary stabilization steps.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator from Virginia is referring specifically to the Witteveen Facility.

Could the Senator from Pennsylvania indicate how many countries might be eligible to participate in this Witteveen fund?

Mr. HEINZ. Any country that has the need for the kind of extended financing that this facility is designed to accommodate and that meets the general criteria I enunciated a moment ago would be eligible, and that includes the United States.

Some people say if the dollar keeps dropping and our energy imports keep increasing and we do not do a better job of exporting, we may want to be one of the first customers of this facility.

I do not necessarily agree, and I certainly hope it does not come to that, but there is nothing to prevent the United States from being one of the facility's customers. Indeed, from time to time the United States has gone to the International Monetary Fund and has received assistance.

I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CHURCH. I simply wanted to make that point.

The United States has been both a creditor and a debtor to the International Monetary Fund over the past 30 years. The United States has drawn currency from the International Monetary Fund on 23 occasions, most recently in 1972. The drawings have totaled $3.5 billion.

Incidentally, I wonder if it might be helpful at this point to have printed in the RECORD a list of those countries that are members of the International Monetary Fund. There are 134 member countries.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Yes. I think that will be very desirable.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the list be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMBER

Afghanistan, Algeria, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Benin, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Burma, Burundi, Cambodia, Cameroon, Canada.

Central African Empire, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, People's Republic of the Congo, Costa Rica, Cyprus, Denmark, Dominican Rep., Ecuador, Egypt, El Salavador, Equatorial Guinea.

Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, The, Germany, Fed. Rep. of, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India.

Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Korea, Kuwait, Lao People's Dem. Rep., Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libya.

Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Morocco, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway.

Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia.

Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, South Africa, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Rep., Tanzania, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey.

Uganda, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United States, Upper Volta, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Western Samoa, Yemen Arab Rep., Yemen, People's Dem. Rep. of, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator from Virginia is speaking of the Witteveen fund. The Witteveen fund, how long has it been in existence?

Mr. HEINZ. The Witteveen Facility is technically not in existence.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. That is what I thought. So these figures being put in the RECORD do not apply to the Witteveen Facility?

Mr. HEINZ. Well, let me say to the Senator from Virginia that only members of the International Monetary Fund——

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Of which there are 134.

Mr. HEINZ (continuing). May be eligible for assistance under the Witteveen Facility. But while the Witteveen Facility is being financed by a smaller group of countries than all the 130-plus members of the International Monetary Fund—it being a separate facility from the quota increases that from time to time are established—it will not take effect until the United States ratifies its participation, as we are doing here and as we will do, presumably, through the appropriations process as a final step.

The Senator's participation in that was very important.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Witteveen Facility is a new program?

Mr. HEINZ. Yes. I would say it is a new program. But it is also a different program, unlike the quota increases. This is unlike the quota increases, which are essentially permanent in terms of our support for the fund. This is a temporary facility. Each nation that has contributed to this facility begins to get repayments, as I understand it, within 5 years or as soon as 5 years.

Mr. CHURCH. It is my understanding that within 3½ years after the first drawings, the repayments begin.

Mr. HEINZ. The Senator is correct. The first drawings might not take place for up to a year and a half. So from 3½ to 5 years out, we could start receiving back the money, or our commitment of support could be reduced.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator.

The statement which was put in the RECORD by the Senator from Idaho does not refer to the Witteveen Facility, because that is not yet in operation. So the Witteveen Facility applies to those countries that are members in the International Monetary Fund—that is the list that the Senator from Idaho put in the RECORD.

Mr. CHURCH. Yes. The same countries would be eligible to participate in the Witteveen Facility.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. So, as I understand it, 134 countries would be eligible to participate in this program.

Mr. HEINZ. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The junior Senator from Pennsylvania mentioned that at the end of 3½ years, repayment would be made to the various countries that have contributed to the Witteveen fund. Is that correct?

Mr. HEINZ. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I understood the senior Senator from Pennsylvania to state, when he presented his amendment, that the only way those funds could be returned to the United States was with the approval of the International Monetary Fund.

Mr. HEINZ. Let me explain two things to the Senator from Virginia.

First of all, the United States is making a commitment to support the Witteveen Facility, which does not necessarily entail the transfer of currency to the facility. We make a promise to support it, in effect. Whether or not we actually are requested by the IMF to send currency—dollars—to the facility, might or might not take place. In either case, whether it is simply our promise to support or the fact of our support, at the beginning, perhaps as soon as 3½ years from now, either the money or the promise that we have made would be reduced, in effect.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator from Virginia is not clear as to whether the position enunciated by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania prevails or whether the position enunciated by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania prevails.

Mr. HEINZ. Let me yield to Senator CHURCH, to clarify this.

Mr. CHURCH. I think the confusion arises from the fact that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania had in mind the ordinary workings of the IMF.

It is true that in the case of permanent contributions, they can be drawn back, so to speak, by the United States only with the consent of the Fund. However, the Witteveen Facility is set up on a different basis, and the statement of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania is not accurate. It is not correct.

The Witteveen Facility is meant to be a temporary facility, and in due course the money contributed to it will be returned to those countries contributing. This is guaranteed by contractual agreement and is not left to the discretion of the IMF.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. How does the legislation read where it makes a mandatory return?

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I yield.

Mr. HEINZ. My understanding is that, in the contract that is the Witteveen Facility agreement, to which the United States will be a signatory in good standing, when and if we pass this measure, and when and if the Appropriations Committees enact appropriate legislation, the President concurring, there are words to the effect that repayment of drawings under the supplementary facility—that is to say, the Witteveen Facility—will be made in equal semiannual installments, beginning not later than 3½ years and completed not later than 7 years from the date of drawing.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Just one additional question, and then I will yield to the Senator from North Carolina; and then, if we may, I would like to get back to this point.

The Witteveen Facility would provide loans to various countries. Is that correct?

Mr. HEINZ. A loan is one way of characterizing the kind of support that it provides.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Either loans or grants.

Mr. HEINZ. But it is not necessarily what the Senator from Virginia and I would consider a loan.

For example, a country that wants to stabilize its balance of payments situation might obtain from the IMF, under the Witteveen Facility, a commitment to which it would make a reciprocal response, instead of commitment, whereby the IMF—let us say hypothetically—for a period of 3 years would agree to be the purchaser of that country's currency, so that that country would not be forced to sell on the open currency market an amount of currency that would create confusion in the market for that currency, and which would, for all intents and purposes, create monetary chaos for that country's currency.

So, as I say, it is not necessarily a loan. Money is not necessarily given for a promise to pay. The country, for example, may simply give some of its money to the IMF; and the IMF, in return, will provide an alternative or hard currency.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from North Carolina without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2437

(Purpose: To authorize the striking of gold medallions)

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk numbered 2437, which I call up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) proposes an amendment numbered 2437.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 2, between lines 17 and 18, insert—

"TITLE I—BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT AMENDMENTS"

On page 2, line 18, strike out "That the" and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 101. The".

On page 3, line 10, strike out "SEC. 2." and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 102.".

At the end of the bill, add the following:

"TITLE II—GOLD MEDALLIONS

"SEC. 201. This title may be cited as the 'Gold Medallion Act of 1978'.

"SEC. 202. (a) (1) Upon a determination by the Secretary of the Treasury (hereinafter referred to as the 'Secretary') that it is in the national interest to sell gold, the Secretary shall offer all or part of such gold for sale to the public in accordance with this title in the form of gold medallions, of two sizes, one of which shall contain one ounce of .999 fine gold but shall be manufactured from .900 fine gold, and one such medallion shall contain one-half ounce of .999 fine gold but shall be manufactured from .900 fine gold.

"(2) The one ounce medallion shall have on its face the likeness of the Statue of Freedom atop the dome of the Capitol Building, surrounded by laurel leaves. The word 'freedom' shall be inscribed above the likeness, and the words 'one ounce fine gold' shall be inscribed in the remaining area inside the edge of the medallion. The obverse of the one ounce medallion shall have a representation of the Great Seal of the United States, and be inscribed with the words 'United States of America' and the numerals of the year the medallion is produced inside the edge of the medallion.

"(3) The one-half ounce medallion shall have on its face, an appropriate design symbolizing the rights of individuals, the words 'Human Rights' and the words 'one-half ounce fine gold'. The obverse shall have a representation of the Great Seal of the United States and be inscribed with the words 'United States of America' and the numerals of the year in which the medallion is produced.

"(b) If the Secretary determines that less than one and one-half million ounces of gold is to be sold in any fiscal year after the date of enactment of this title, all such gold shall be sold in the form of the medallions described in subsection (a).

"(c) If the Secretary determines that more than one and one-half million ounces of gold are to be sold in any such year, that part of the excess gold which is not struck into medallions shall be sold in such a manner as the Secretary deems appropriate.

"SEC. 203. (a) The medallions shall be produced in the first year of production in the ratio of two one-half ounce medallions for each one ounce medallion to be struck. In subsequent years, the ratio shall be adjusted to meet anticipated demand.

"(b) Notwithstanding any other provisions of this title the number of medallions to be produced and sold in succeeding years in which sales of gold are held, shall be adjusted to meet anticipated demand.

"SEC. 204. (a) Upon the determination referred to in section 2, the Secretary shall announce such determination, together with the total quantity medallions to be sold, and the date or dates on which the sale or sales will be held. For the purpose of carrying out any such sale, the Secretary shall enter into such arrangements with the Administrator of General Services as may be appropriate.

"(b) Such arrangements for the sale of medallions shall be made so as to encourage broad public participation.

"(c) Such rules and regulations as may be appropriate in carrying out functions under this section are hereby authorized.

"SEC. 205. The Secretary shall direct the Bureau of the Mint to reserve out of the gold to be struck into the medallions under this title a quantity determined, on the basis of orders or surveys, by such Bureau to be sufficient to meet the need for premium quality medallions at a fair, market related price.

"SEC. 206. Notwithstanding any other provisions of this title, the authority contained herein shall expire five years after the date of enactment of this title.".

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE) be added as a cosponsor of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I offer this amendment today because, first, the Gold Medallion Act, which I introduced some time ago, proposes a minor change in our laws that has been researched carefully; and, second, because it would meet the desires of from 1 million to 2 million Americans—citizens who want to make modest investments in gold but who now, in order to purchase even a piece of gold, must buy Mexican or Austrian or South African gold pieces.

Mr. President, this amendment simply provides that when the Treasury sells gold—whenever, in the wisdom of the Secretary of the Treasury, some of the U.S. gold stocks should be sold—a portion of that gold equal to last year's consumption of gold bullion coins be made into 1-ounce and one-half-ounce medallions. That is all.

This is all the amendment proposes. It does not revoke the Treasury Department's authority. It does not require gold sales. It certainly does not "remonetize" gold, as the Treasury seems to fear.

The gold medallions contemplated under this amendment would not have a specific monetary value. They would not be stamped with any dollar value. They would, however, compete in the same market with gold pieces of other nations presently totalling about $400 million in sales each year in this country.

Mr. President, that is money that is going abroad, hurting our balance of payments. If the U.S. gold medallion is produced, I would expect that the influx of foreign gold coins would drop dramatically.

Instead of helping our international situation, the Treasury Department suggests that this amendment would hurt our international situation, and this I deny. Frankly, the logic of the Treasury Department is baffling.

I received a communication from the Department just the other day containing a number of arguments that merit only brief rebuttal. One of the most glaring inconsistencies in the Treasury Department's response to a letter written by me to them is the contention that somehow gold pieces will undermine the credibility of the President's efforts against inflation. This morning's news carried the word that the President's chief inflation fighter, Robert Strauss thinks inflation this year will be about 9 percent. That is 30 percent higher than the President's own prediction of 6 months ago.

Mr. Strauss' comments suggest more a lack of credibility of the President's anti-inflation program than an argument against the production of gold medallions—I might emphasize again: nonmonetary gold medallions.

What is both curious and disturbing, Mr. President, is that the Treasury Department tells us that gold is not money. They tell us that it has been "demonetized." They then turn around and say that the production of a nonmonetary gold piece would upset inflation programs, and perhaps hurt the dollar in international markets.

Let us look at that curious argument for a moment. Sales of about $300 million of gold pieces will net the Government $300 million, and will represent a figure equal to about 4 percent of the growth of the money supply. The sale of gold medallions over a year would be equal to the amount the Federal debt increases in just 2 days.

I ask, how in the name of rationality can a gold medallion undermine exchange rates when the administration is increasing the Federal debt at the rate of $60 billion a year, and the money supply is increasing at a rate far in excess of the economy's ability to absorb it without inflation.

If ever the Treasury Department set up a strawman to be a threat to the dollar, this is it. Its opposition to the proposal in connection with the gold medallion is a strawman, no more, no less.

I ask, Mr. President, how much will it hurt the dollar if we produce a gold medallion? Let us look north for our lesson. The Canadian dollar is about as bad off as a currency can be. Yet, the Canadian Government is going ahead with a program to produce a gold bullion coin. If production of a gold bullion piece hurt a nation's currency, would Canada, with a faltering dollar, be undermining her currency by issuing gold pieces?

Let me stress that Canada is not going at this in a small way. My office has been in touch with officials in Ottawa who predict that the Canadians will soon be producing $600 million of these pieces per year. The chief problem Canadians perceive is keeping people supplied with these pieces, and they report enthusiasm from American banks who are anxious to distribute the Canadian pieces.

Mr. President, I fear the Treasury Department is digging out arguments against a gold bullion medallion that they used when the Senate considered making gold ownership legal.

I remember the predictions of gloom and doom when that proposition was first offered here in the Senate. Those predictions did not come true when gold was legalized.

The Treasury used the same arguments before gold clause contracts were made legal. We heard predictions of doom and gloom. These predictions blew away after President Carter signed the gold clause contract freedom into law. Nothing adverse happened.

Now we see and hear the same shopworn arguments being dredged up from the depths of the Treasury Department, and I predict that if and when Congress enacts this proposal, the Treasury Department will conveniently forget about some of the arguments that it has made in opposition to the production of gold medallions.

Mr. President, I ask the distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin, my friend, who is the distinguished chairman of the Banking Committee, if he will comment on this proposal.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I congratulate the distinguished Senator from North Carolina for bringing up this measure. It obviously is a very innovative and interesting approach.

The Senator from North Carolina has had a far more far-reaching effect on our monetary policy than most people realize, particularly with respect to gold.

He points out in his statement that this gold medallion bill is unique in many respects. He says that this medallion will have no specific monetary value, as I understand it.

Mr. HELMS. That is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. And yet it would be, of course, of a specific size and therefore its value could be easily determined from the world price of gold.

Mr. HELMS. That is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. So it would be easy to calculate, if it is one ounce or one-sixteenth of an ounce, or whatever, by taking whatever the world price of gold per ounce is.

Then he indicates that in his judgment the influx of foreign gold coins would drop and, of course, if that developed that would have a favorable effect on our balance of payments, and I think he is right about that.

Then, he also argues that the Treasury opposes this but for reasons which he thinks are not very sound.

They argue, No. 1, it could have an inflationary effect. They argue, No. 2, as he points out, that it would have an increase in the money supply which might be significant. He says that would be very small. I think he said 4 percent increase in the money supply.

Of course, it is in an exotic form and because it does not carry a specific price it is hard to know the extent to which it would circulate, how it would affect the money supply, and how it would compete with currency, cash, and bank deposits.

For all these reasons, it seems to me we do need to have more information. We certainly should, in my view, have a hearing in which we have the Treasury Department, the Federal Reserve Board, the economic experts, the Canadian experts who have had the experience they had in Canada, the collectors who have an interest in this and might have a very useful viewpoint they could give us. I think if we could make a record on that kind of a basis we might be in a far better position to determine how to act on the Helms proposal.

As I say, it is a very interesting proposal and it might have a very desirable effect.

I think one of the points the Senator has made privately to me—he did not stress it in the Chamber today—was that the American people are among the few people in the world who are not able to buy and sell gold freely. It is a freedom that other people enjoy, and in view of the fact that gold throughout history or throughout most of history has been the principal monetary unit, it is a freedom that we should not treat lightly.

So I think the Senator is taking a step which might be very constructive and useful. I would like, as chairman of the committee, to have an opportunity for the committee to explore this and to determine whether or not we might be able to support the bill because I think maybe we might very well be able to do something.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I am very encouraged by the distinguished Senator's comments, and I appreciate them as I appreciate the fine work he does in all matters.

With the Senator's comments and his suggestion about hearings, I am inclined to withdraw the amendment, but I would want to ask the Senator this: Does he think it might be possible to have these hearings at a fairly early date?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Yes, I will be happy to schedule hearings as soon as I can.

I might tell the distinguished Senator from North Carolina that I discussed this matter with the leader today and he indicated there will be, in his judgment, a limitation within the next few weeks of committees being able to report legislation to the floor for passage this year.

I would be very happy to schedule this as soon as possible, but I do not think I could make a commitment that the committee would report it for action this year, at least for final action this year by the House and Senate. But I can assure the Senator we will have hearings this year.

Mr. HELMS. I am sure the Senator will do the very best he can in that connection, and if it turns out we can have it I certainly would be grateful. If not, we can proceed next year, whether I am in the Senate or not. That is up to the Lord and the people of North Carolina on November 7. But I do appreciate the Senator's interest, and I am particularly grateful for his willingness to conduct hearings.

I yield to the Senator from California (Mr. HAYAKAWA).

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I would like to say just a word or two in support of the Gold Medallion Act introduced by Senator HELMS. I think the fear that gold will be monetized as a result of the issuance of these gold medallions is totally without foundation. If these medallions are issued without a denomination of value placed upon them they do become very similar to the Krugerrand issued by South America, which has been sold in enormous numbers in the United States simply because many Americans, as well as people in other parts of the world, would like to have this kind of stored value which gold represents.

I do believe the American people are entitled to have access to this historic value, people of modest means no less than people who have $70,000 to put in a 400-ounce brick.

So in the interest of peer justice for the people who do want to make this kind of investment, I do believe the American Government should issue such gold medallions as Senator HELMS has suggested.

I thank the Chair.

I yield back to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MELCHER). The amendment is withdrawn.

The Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.).

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I would like to resume commenting on one or two matters in the bill.

As I understand it, 134 countries are eligible to participate in this fund. I know the managers have studied the matter carefully. Obviously, it is not expected that 134 countries will need or will seek to avail themselves of this new facility, if and when Congress approves it.

I am wondering if the manager of the bill would indicate which countries are most likely to be the beneficiaries of this facility.

Mr. CHURCH. I would have to speculate in answering that question. The facility is designed especially to accommodate the balance of payments difficulties that have been greatly accentuated by the high price of oil.

There are a number of countries that are overextended.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Which ones are those?

Mr. CHURCH. I am about to mention them. The following countries would seem to be in a position where they might wish to apply for the assistance available once the Witteveen Facility has been set up: Peru is one such country; Jamaica is another; Spain and Portugal are possibilities; Turkey a probability, I should think; Egypt a likely prospect; Zaire another possibility. There may be others, but these would seem to me to be governments that might well apply for the help that would be made available through the Witteveen Facility.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator.

We already have in existence, and the United States has already made very substantial contributions—heavy contributions—to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, known as the World Bank, to the International Finance Corporation, International Development Association, the Inter-American Development Bank, the Asian Development Bank, and the African Development Fund.

My question is, considering the international financial institutions that we have already established, Are not these institutions capable of taking care of whatever financial problem may arise?

Mr. CHURCH. I will answer the question briefly and then I will turn to the distinguished Senator from Illinois and the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

The other international financial institutions to which the Senator from Virginia referred engage in making project loans available to foreign governments. The International Monetary Fund—the IMF—was set up for a different purpose; namely, to stabilize countries experiencing serious problems with their currencies. This usually occurs when a country's balance of payments is in a serious deficit position.

If the IMF were not there to tide over these countries that find themselves close to insolvency, we could have a series of defaults that could lead, like falling dominoes, to a general collapse.

In the past, the IMF has helped immensely to avert such a crisis in the international monetary system, and the Witteveen Facility will give it an extra capability to deal with the disequilibrium which has been caused by the exorbitant increases in the price of oil that have been imposed by the OPEC cartel.

That disequilibrium may well, in time, adjust itself into better balance, and we hope so. But we do need the additional time that the Witteveen Facility will provide. Without that facility it is altogether possible that countries in great financial distress could default on their international obligations, and this could have a devastating impact upon the financial stability of the entire world.

So my answer to the Senator's question is that the IMF plays a role in these matters quite different from that played by the multilateral banks, the international financial institutions which loan money for the purpose of financing projects abroad.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator from Idaho. I want to read three paragraphs from a Wall Street Journal editoral of September 26, 1977, which was written when the House of Representatives was considering this proposal. The editorial reads:

> The plain fact is, the IMF is among the chief sources of the planet's economic problems, and it shows no signs of reforming. The main topic of mischief this week no doubt will be the care and feeding of the Witteveen facility, named after its creator, Johannes Witteveen, the IMF chairman. What is the Witteveen facility? First we will tell you the problem the W–F seeks to correct. Over the last 25 years, a lot of poor countries around the world came to the IMF and asked what they had to do to get ahead. The IMF advised them to borrow lots of money in the world's capital markets—the big New York and London banks, mainly—and use the money to build "infrastructure." Dutifully, the little countries did so, but this has not proved the key to development.

Then, after a few more paragraphs it says:

> American taxpayers, in other words, will be asked to cough up a few billion for the IMF loan to the poor countries so they can pay off the banks.

I will be glad if the managers of the bill care to comment one way or the other on that. That is not the statement of the Senator from Virginia, I might say; it is the statement of the editors of the Wall Street Journal.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, if I may respond to the Senator from Virginia, I have listened carefully to what he has to say.

First, let me ask unanimous consent that what I consider to be quite an accurate portrayal of the way the IMF operates, from the July 23 Washington Post, be printed in the RECORD at this point. The article is entitled "These Days, When the IMF Talks, Countries Listen."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 23, 1978]

THESE DAYS, WHEN THE IMF TALKS, COUNTRIES LISTEN

(By Art Pine)

Last February, a four-member field team was quietly sent from the International Monetary Fund to the Zambian capital, Lusaka, for discreet negotiations. The subject: the Zambian government's request for a $305 million emergency loan to save the country's credit by underwriting its heavy balance-of-payments deficit.

After 21 days of delicate discussions, Zambia had its money. But in return, Prime Minister Kenneth Kaunda had to promise to devalue his country's currency and slash government spending. The devaluation meant higher prices for imports, and the spending cuts meant reductions in income. The two actions lowered the Zambian standard of living, but the government had no choice. It was either accept the IMF's conditions or go bankrupt.

What occurred isn't unusual, but it serves to illustrate a point. The fund, a 30-nation organization whose job is to police the badly strained world monetary system, is gaining increased power and influence over its members' affairs—often, in the case of weaker nations, to the point of setting the terms of their domestic economic policies.

Besides the Zambia case, the fund has forced stringent austerity measures in 21 deficit-plagued nations over the past several years. In 1974 and 1977, it issued new lines of credit to Italy and the United Kingdom. In June, it approved a loan to Jamaica. And now IMF officials are in the midst of negotiating with war-torn Zaire. What's more, international experts say the fund's clout is growing almost daily.

The question is, how is the IMF's bureaucracy, housed in a bulky, atrium-topped building on 19th Street, exercising its new power? Some critics say the fund is too arbitrary and inflexible—overly tough on developing countries, and insensitive to the "human" consequences of the belt-tightening it prescribes for problem-ridden nations.

Indeed, fund-mandated government austerity programs recently led to rioting in Peru and Egypt, with residents protesting their leaders' decisions to raise domestic prices. And diplomats from some developing nations regularly grouse that IMF officials demand more of smaller countries than large ones. "If the big countries resist," says one, "the fund disappears."

The increased clout is a relatively recent phenomenon. Only a few years ago, the IMF's attempts to give countries economic advice were treated as little more than a gentleman's game. Fund field representatives held annual "consultations" with all member governments. But their urgings were taken with a grain of salt—particularly if the sitting government disagreed.

But now, with the past few years' dramatic changes in the world economic situation, the fund has become a power to be reckoned with. "These days," says one international economist, "when the IMF talks, more and more countries are listening." And so are private banks and other international lending institutions.

The big multinational banks, in fact, are among the big winners in the fund's hardline approach. Although the money lent by the IMF ostensibly is for government-to-government balance of payments transactions, once it's in a country's hands it can be used to pay off loans to private banks if need be. And the IMF's policy prescriptions serve to guarantee the banks that the country will be a better credit risk.

The IMF's heightened new influence stems basically from two developments:

The sharp rise in oil prices the Arab nations engineered in 1973 has thrown more countries into deficit—and dependence on IMF loans to save them from bankruptcy. Since private banks rely heavily on IMF judgments—and backup—in their own lending to countries, the fund's pronouncements on policy have extra weight. If a nation wants the IMF's seal of approval, it has to toe the line.

The recent overhaul of the international monetary system has given the fund formal new authority to exercise "surveillance" over problem countries that have severe payments imbalances. While no one yet knows precisely how much power that entails, the charter revisions have given the IMF's recommedations increased status.

The fund's say-so over domestic economic polices of individual countries stems primarily from its power over its own purse strings—specifically, the conditions it sets for making loans to countries that are in difficulty over exceptionally large balance of payments deficits. (A country gets into deficit when its imports and investments abroad outstrip its exports and intake of capital.)

The IMF's role in the world economic system essentially is that of a policeman for the "haves" * * * other lent money to financially troubled countries, and, indirectly, the large multinational banks. (The World Bank, the fund's sister organization, deals with helping the "have-nots" by offering grants or low-interest loans for economic development projects in poor countries.)

If a rich or poor nation gets into balance of payments difficulty, the fund steps in—often as lender of last resort—with an offer to help bail out that government by providing a sizable line of credit. But the credit is hinged in the condition that the country adopt stringent fiscal and monetary policies designed to eliminate its payments deficit. The more a country wants to borrow, the stiffer the terms the IMF sets. Often, by the time a country seeks fund help, it's too late for anything but severe belt-tightening.

Fund officials argue that the trade-off is fair enough: Were it not for the IMF's underwriting, the individual nations would go bankrupt, and would have to impose much harsher austerity programs than those the fund insists on. Like a benevolent banker, the fund aims for gradually restoring economic health to the deficit country—not pay up on the spot.

Under the basic IMF loan system, nations may borrow up to 100 percent of their "quota," or membership fee in the fund, divided into four separate "tranches" or lending categories, each with a progressively tougher set of strings attached. There also are special longer-term lending pools from which members may borrow additional amounts.

It's the power to set conditions for making loans that gives the fund most of its clout. The organization's charter is worded vaguely enough that officials are free to establish whatever terms they think are needed. Talks between the government and fund representatives often last for weeks. At the end, everything must be approved by the IMF executive board.

The results often are striking. In Zambia's case, for example, the government won a credit of $305 million, but had to devalue its currency by 10 percent and sharply slash spending. Great Britain won authority to borrow up to $4 billion, but had to raise interest rates and pare spending. Jamaica received $244 million—after devaluing and promised to slow wage increases.

Moreover, the IMF continues to influence national policies even after a loan is granted, because the aid usually is only for a year or so and requires a "performance evaluation" for renewal. So, Jamaica this year had to renegotiate a new domestic economic program after its 1977 efforts failed to meet the fund's criteria. And IMF officials prodded Sri Lanka into its most sweeping economic reforms ever.

IMF authorities insist the fund doesn't "dictate" domestic policies to individual countries. In the first place, the terms it sets almost always are worded in the euphemisms of international economics, unlikely to offend any government. "We never ask a country to devalue its currency," an insider says. "We just agree on limits for net foreign assets of its central bank."

Secondly, fund negotiators almost always suggest several options for governments on each major issue. In the Zambian case, for example, IMF representatives suggested five or six approaches for achieving each economic goal, and then Zambian officials chose among them, based on domestic political considerations.

There's often been criticism that the IMF's judgments are made by staff, not political officials, meaning that a nation's policies, in effect, are determined by sometimes youthful economists who never have been elected to office. In essence, that criticism is accurate. But often the IMF staff members are experienced. And in all cases, their work is reviewed by top fund officials and the executive board.

In the case of the Zambian negotiations, all four fund field team members were economists: a 40-year-old Italian, who has spent his career with the IMF and other international economic institutions; a 33-year-old Japanese economist; a 30-year-old Finn, and a 29-year-old London School of Economics graduate who had been at the fund seven years.

Their proposals, the result of weeks of work, were approved by Zambian policymakers and top IMF officials. The decisions at the Zambian end were made by the prime minister and finance minister.

William B. Dale, a former U.S. Treasury official who is the fund's deputy managing-director, insists that "the fund can't dictate a nation's domestic economic policy." Even if a country "agreed to whatever we suggested," he says, "it's they, not we, who administer the policy. They've got to become satisfied the policies are correct before they adopt them."

And Paul A. Volcker, former U.S. undersecretary of the treasury for monetary affairs and now president of the New York Federal Reserve Bank, says the fund's analysts usually are right on target. "You can pick your individual instances where in hindsight there's been some problem," Volcker says, "but by and large the fund people do their jobs pretty well."

Still in the end, even fund insiders agree, the bottom line is whether the deficit-plagued country wants the IMF's money and imprimatur. "The borrowing countries accept the terms because they need the IMF's Good Housekeeping seal of approval," says a U.S. official familiar with the negotiation process. "They know they can't function without it."

Adds one high developing-country policymaker involved recently in negotiating an IMF loan for his country: "It's just astonishing how much authority the IMF mission chief has. You're really dealing with a high-class bunch of people here, and on balance I'd have to say they were fair. But the staff has one hell of a lot of clout."

Fund officials deny the agency is more stringent with developing countries than with industrial nations—citing as examples recent demands on the United Kingdom and Italy. "It's fairly obvious we're not going to push big or small countries if they don't want to," one fund source concedes. "The difficulty is, the smaller countries are in financial trouble more often."

Nevertheless, as holder of the purse strings, the fund can get tough when it wants to. In ongoing negotiations with Zaire, a beleaguered Mobuto government already has agreed to give the IMF extensive influence over the country's economic policies as part of a $1 billion plan to bolster its shaky regime. There even will be an IMF "technical adviser" in the Zairian central bank.

And Robert Solomon, a former Federal Reserve Board international monetary adviser who now is at the Brookings Institution, suggests there may be some truth to the charges that larger countries—and those with balances of payment surpluses, which theoretically are supposed to be as bad as deficits—emerge less scathed.

"The fund may indeed have been too tough on some countries," Solomon says. "We seem to have fashioned a monetary system with the same old prejudices—that a deficit is bad but a surplus is good." He also is critical of the way IMF policy prescriptions are formulated: "You sometimes get the feeling that some pretty junior staff people are in effect mandating policy."

In any case, there seems to be agreement that the organization's demands are rarely really unfounded. As a U.S. official puts it, "The problem isn't the fund—the problem is the countries are in a bind and need to take drastic steps to get out. The reality is that the IMF loan makes it less painful for these countries to make their adjustments—even with the demands the fund makes."

The question is, how much is the fund's insistence an unwarranted intrusion on national sovereignty? While some countries go kicking and screaming to the IMF's bargaining tables, others seem to welcome the fund's toughness as a cover for imposing needed cutbacks they know will be unpopular. "The fund makes a terrific scapegoat," one policymaker says.

In still other cases, the governments sometimes turn out to be too weak or ill-equipped to carry out cutback programs on their own. In Peru, for example, outside observers say it's unlikely the regime would have been able to slash programs without fund intervention. And onlookers say Zairean officials simply weren't technically able to develop their own programs.

At least some of the criticism over the way the fund treats developing countries may be reduced as a result of a new approach to IMF lending involving long-term loans. Until recently, the major form of IMF lending has been to extend credit to a country for a year at a time. If the government did not perform as expected, the line of credit simply was canceled.

Under the new program, however, the fund now works out a longer term plan with borrowing nations designed to help restore the local economy over a three-year period. In the case of Jamaica, where Prime Minister Michael Manley has criticized IMF officials for not fully "understanding" poorer nations' needs, policymakers are viewing the new procedure as "a better tool" for the IMF to use.

What is less certain is how much influence the fund will be able to exert on nations that aren't actually trying to borrow money—such as West Germany, Denmark, or even the U.S. Although the organization's newly revised charter grants it increased power in this area, the rules of the game haven't been drawn yet "They're still feeling their way," a knowledgeable onlooker says.

Dale and other IMF officials insist that "we're taking the matter seriously" in trying to develop standards and procedures for policing countries that are not currently borrowing, but some observers are skeptical. "The fact is, they're just not going to be able to force any nation to make cutbacks if it doesn't need IMF money," one observer says.

The issue may be decided quickly, however. Jacques de Larosiere, the fund's new managing-director, was a coauthor (along with former U.S. treasury undersecretary Edwin H. Yeo) of the fund's new "surveillance" power, and is said to be taking a more aggressive stance than his predecessor, former Dutch finance minister H. Johannes Witteveen.

The fund's directors are appointed by the various finance ministries of the IMF's 130 member nations and take their policy instructions from their home governments. The voting power of the directors is weighted according to the size of the economy of the nation they represent. The U.S. director controls just under 21 percent of the votes. Zambia's ballot is counted in with those of several other African nations as a single regional vote.

In any case, the corner has been turned for the once-toothless IMF. To the officials in the Zambian treasury—and others in governments throughout the industrial and developing world—the fund now is a force to be respected. And for better or worse, analysts say that's unlikely to change very soon.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, first, to enlarge on something Senator CHURCH was saying, the principal difference about the IMF, even more than all the other differences which were pointed out quite accurately by Senator CHURCH, is that it is able to, and successfully is, imposing very important terms and conditions on the countries that ask it for help, in the best interests of those countries.

Sometimes it is difficult for a country to make those decisions that are responsible decisions. Indeed, the Senator from Virginia has urged on this country time and again more responsible decisions and a little less attention to the politics of those decisions, and I think he has done well in that respect.

The IMF requires these countries to be responsible, and that is one of its most important characteristics. The consequence, I think, of what I am saying is that I am not sure it is entirely accurate or fair to say that the IMF has driven some countries into the clutches of the international bankers. There are countries that have gotten into the clutches of the banks. This is clear. But I do not know of any documented evidence that in fact the IMF is acting as shill for the banks.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, the Senator from Virginia did not so allege.

Mr. HEINZ. I did not say the Senator from Virginia, but the Wall Street Journal indicated——

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Correct.

Mr. HEINZ [continuing]. That the IMF had urged several small countries to go to the banks. That is the view of the writers of that article, and I am not sure it reflects reality.

Mr. HARRY. F. BYRD, JR. Correct.

Mr. HEINZ. I believe the Senator asked what is unique about this facility. The IMF's financing or support, under existing credit tranches and under the extended facility, is limited to a maximum of 3 years. Frankly, you cannot straighten up all the problems of all countries in 3 years. The purpose of the Witteveen Facility is to try to provide more than 3 years for such countries to readjust their economies to the problems that they face.

I also wish to point out that this facility is available, not just to the less developed countries that face large deficit problems occasioned by the rise of OPEC, but to the developed countries as well. Senator CHURCH indicated earlier that the United States had gone to the IMF. It is not without the realm of imagination that other developed nations, the United States included, could come and seek, if they were so pressed, assistance under this facility. Indeed, there are people who look at our economy and say that the structural problems we have in our economy today are the result of many years, not just a few, of mismanagement, and that it will take quite a few years to get this country back on the right track, if we have the political will to do so.

I hope that is responsive to the concerns of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania. May I ask this question: Up to this point, how much has the United States put into the International Monetary Fund?

Mr. HEINZ. Through the sixth quota increase, my understanding is that it is in the neighborhood of $9 billion; $9.75 billion.

Again I would point out that that is not necessarily money that we have delivered, but it includes——

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. An obligation of the U.S. Government.

Mr. HEINZ. A promise to pay, or the funds to do so.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. What is the current status of the IMF fund?

Mr. HEINZ. When you say "the current status," what precisely would you like to know?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I would like to know this: The United States has put $9.75 billion into that fund. I suppose the next question should be, How much have other countries put into that fund?

Mr. HEINZ. Let me ask unanimous consent, in order to answer the Senator's question, to have printed in the RECORD at this point, Mr. President, the information I have before me noted as table 1, which will show amounts that have been accepted under the sixth general review for all the countries that are members of the International Monetary Fund.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] International Monetary Fund; quotas were coverted into dollars at average January–June 1977 dollar/SDR exchange rate.

[2] International Monetary Fund; balance on goods, services and public and private transfers. Country groupings are as shown the International Financial Statistics of the IMF. On U.S. accounting basis, the U.S. position for 1974–76 would be: −1,935; 15,552; −1,324.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator indicate the figures?

Mr. HEINZ. There are 130-some countries.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Do we have a total?

Mr. HEINZ. The total is, in round figures, $40 billion.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. So $40 billion has been put into the fund?

Mr. HEINZ. That is correct.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Of which the United States put in——

Mr. HEINZ. $9.7 billion.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Slightly less than $10 billion?

Mr. HEINZ. That is correct.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. So the United States has put in 25 percent of that fund?

Mr. HEINZ. Roughly, that is correct.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. What does the fund have in it at the present time? What is its cash position?

Mr. HEINZ. According to the estimates I have heard, the fund has about $15 billion.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Why could not that $15 billion be used for the purposes for which the Witteveen facility is intended?

Mr. HEINZ. Because under the terms of the IMF agreement with member countries, that money is restricted to shorter term financing of either 1 year in the case of the normal credit and no more than 3 years in the case of the extended facilities.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Is it correct, as the Wall Street Journal contends, that the funds which go to the Witteveen Facility will be used to a significant degree to pay off loans which various countries have obtained from various banks, principally New York and London banks?

Mr. HEINZ. I could not agree with the Wall Street Journal in that regard. Not only is that pure speculation, but I just do not think that the record bears that out. The Witteveen Facility does not bail out either countries or banks. It is not a welfare program. It operates as a central bank to the world in the same way the Federal Reserve operates as a stabilizing effect, as the central bank in the United States. The facility is explicitly not for the purpose of paying off old debts to banks or otherwise. It is, rather, to encourage countries which face large balance-of-payments deficits resulting from domestic economic distortion and excessive imports or other factors to adopt sound measures. Without adequate financing to cover the transition period while these adjustment measures take effect, there is a danger that these countries will feel it necessary to deal with these deficits by either excessive deflation or imposing protectionist measures. We are the great losers, as one of the great traders, if they impose protectionist measures.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. May I follow up on one point,

The Senator mentioned excessive protectionist measures. As I recollect, one of the countries in the list of seven which is likely to benefit from this fund is Jamaica, which has taken rather unusual steps in regard to permitting the United States to buy bauxite from them, which is vitally important to the United States. So they are already taking a protectionist step.

I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, there are many misconceptions about the IMF. It does not provide long-term financing for projects for development. It does provide financing, as Senators CHURCH and HEINZ have indicated, for current account financing. It is short-term financing.

It does not require contributions from us. The United States has contributed through its participation some $9 billion since the beginning, but it has never lost a cent. The IMF is a central bank for central banks. It is a depository to which countries can make deposits and then draw on them. We have never lost a cent. On the contrary, these deposits, in the case of the Witteveen Facility, will draw interest at rates in excess of the cost of borrowing to the U.S. Treasury.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. But the United States has committed itself to $9 billion.

Mr. STEVENSON. And it can get its money back any time.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Only with the approval of the IMF.

Mr. STEVENSON. And it would not be and has never been denied. The claim can be freely negotiated. It can be sold.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. But the United States cannot get its money back.

Mr. STEVENSON. It can get back its deposits if it wants to, and it has drawn on those deposits some 23 times in the past. It can also exchange its SDR's. In fact, those SDR's in the opinion of many people would be a more valuable holding at the moment than the dollar.

Furthermore, it does not bail out banks. The notion that banks have been led by the IMF to make unsound loans to poor little countries is just plain wrong. Poor little countries of the world have no access at all to private banks. Those are the countries which go to the international development institutions, such as IDA or the regional development banks, for concessionary financing. The poor countries cannot go to CitiBank or any of the other large multinational banks.

The countries which do avail themselves of this credit facility, and, as has been indicated, get current account financing on terms which can be very tough and do require a period of time to get their payments in equilibrium, are countries such as Argentina, Brazil—recently, of course, European countries, such as Italy and the United Kingdom—Chile, Colombia, Mexico, Peru, the Philippines, South Korea, and Taiwan, which are not terribly poor. These countries, in fact, have had growth rates ranging from 5 to 11 percent per year. They are countries that have had per capita growth rates that are very rapid, with rapidly rising standards of living, rapidly rising exports. They are countries which suffer periodically, as in the case of Europe, severe dislocations. At the present time, those dislocations for the most part are caused by the increase in the price of oil. They need to be tided over. The U.K. has been tided over; Italy has been tided over. Soon Mexico will be earning substantial hard currencies from the sale of its natural gas and oil.

It does not behoove the United States to let such countries go down the drain. If we were to do so, of course the banks would suffer, and so would every other commercial institution in the United States. By the same token, keeping the world afloat benefits banks and benefits every other institution. Far from bailing out banks, the experience of the IMF indicates that as the IMF provides current account financing, under tough conditions, bank exposure grows. The banks then find opportunities with which to increase their lending in the world.

The historical experience indicates, at least, that this institution, the only one of its kind in the world, is necessary to maintain economic stability for the benefit of all commercial institutions, and more so for the United States than any other country because this country has by far the largest portion of international trade and commerce of all the countries of the world. We have more to gain. Yet under this facility, at least one other country, Saudi Arabia, would be committing itself to a larger participation than the United States.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I think, by the same token, Saudi Arabia will benefit to a much greater extent than the United States. The United States will not benefit at all, as far as I can judge. Saudi Arabia will benefit because of our, and countries who will receive IMF funds, oil purchases from them.

Mr. HEINZ. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. HEINZ. I just want to lay to rest any notion that anybody has that this facility bails out anybody, especially banks. It does not. I want to make it very clear on the record that that is demonstrably not accurate, not true. The experience with IMF loans demonstrates clearly that bank exposure tends to increase—not decrease—after a standby arrangement is made by the fund. In the period 1970 through 1975, the IMF negotiated standby agreements providing about $2.1 billion; net lending in the private sector in the 35 countries involved actually increased by nearly $9.6 billion during the period covered by the agreement.

I think that demonstrates beyond a shadow of a doubt that, contrary to that notion. the IMF hardly goes about bailing out banks. What they do by virtue of the very conditions imposed through agreements with the countries involved is to improve the structural economic condition of those countries so they are able to stand on their own two feet and make their way in the world as good citizens, at least economically speaking.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I am not speaking in opposition to the IMF. I agree with the Senator from Illinois in regard to the drawing rights. I am not speaking in opposition to the IMF. I do have concern, however, as to whether we want to get into a new program—and this is a new program. It has not even started yet. As the able Senator from Pennsylvania said earlier, it will not even begin until this legislation is passed. So it is a new program.

We have already put $10 billion into the International Monetary Fund, 25 percent of the total. What I am very much concerned about and what makes it very difficult for me to support this legislation is that, despite the very serious position that our Nation is in, despite the fact that foreign governments hold $120 billion of U.S. bonds and notes, despite the fact that on top of that, there are $375 billion of Eurodollars floating around the world, we are coming in here and considering a new program over and above all these other programs that we have.

(Mr. PROXMIRE assumed the Chair.)

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I yield.

Mr. MELCHER. I have been in the Chair and I have been quite confused about some of the statements made in the last few minutes. I wonder if the Senator from Pennsylvania will yield for a question?

Mr. HEINZ. I am happy to yield. I commend the Senator, who was in the Chair, for doing something which may be quite unusual, which is listening very carefully to the debate. Normally, when one is in the Chair, one is permitted to listen, but not permitted to speak. This has a somewhat deadening effect on the senses. So I commend the Senator.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the Senator.

The question I have is that if the International Monetary funds are not to be used for a bailout of a bank or anything else, and while I would not doubt the Senator's judgment on that, the confusing point, to me, is that I was informed that Zambia was granted an International Monetary Fund loan of between $340 million and $346 million last spring—the country was—as a result of the nationally owned copper mines selling great amounts of copper to the world market at depressed prices, and well below the cost of production. The intent of the loan. it was my understanding, was indeed to jack up, rescue, or I used, in my own thinking, the term "bail out" that country's situation from their nationally owned copper mine operation. It would be hard for me to envision that that loan would be a short-term loan in the case of Zambia.

Mr. HEINZ. I am not an expert on each and every one of the IMF transactions, but the Senator is correct that there was, as I understand it, a 1-year loan to Zambia, in return for which the nation of Zambia agreed, as is the custom, to certain conditions. I do not know what those conditions are, but, in general, the IMF, as I said a moment ago to the Senator from Virginia, seeks to try to get individual countries that have gotten themselves in balance-of-payments difficulties to take the responsible, necessary steps to get themselves on the right track.

I share the Senator's concern about welfare programs. This is the farthest thing I know from a welfare program, inasmuch as it requires that, for whatever modest assistance is made available—and is made available temporarily—it has to be repaid. It is only made available to be repaid if certain very hard decisions are made. I should think this is really what we ought to ask of a lot more people and nations in the world.

Mr. MELCHER. If the Senator will yield further——

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Yes.

Mr. MELCHER. I just might make this observation: That a loan made to Zambia of that magnitude, a quarter of a billion dollars, if it is only for a year, is an unrealistic loan, because the term for Zambia to repay it should be much longer. I would categorize it as a high-risk loan made for 1 year only for the purposes of expecting it to be renewed at the end of the year or be picked up by some agency or some other government that would want to give aid to Zambia, because the prospect of the copper market improving much in 12 months' time, from last March to next March, was not predicted by anyone.

There are people who might make predictions as to when the copper market might return to a break-even point, but anything that I have read has been in the long range of perhaps 4 to 5 years down the road.

For our own sake, my own State of Montana, and for the sake of this country, I hope that the copper market returns to a profitable situation, or at least a break-even situation, soon. But the capability of Zambia to repay a loan simply is not in the cards, because all Zambia is facing is a continuation, if they do it—and I think it is foolish to do it—but if they continue to produce and sell copper at below the cost of production, they are going to need another loan on top of that just to—I hesitate to use the term "bail out," but just to prop them up before that year is out.

Mr. HEINZ. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MELCHER. Yes, I yield.

Mr. HEINZ. I think the Senator makes two excellent points. The first point is that without the IMF, the situation might very well have been worse in Zambia. It might—as I say, I cannot say this to be factually correct. But hypothetically, I think it is a reasonable case that Zambia might have been faced with a far worse alternative, bankruptcy, which could have been far more disruptive of the international copper markets and disruptive to our industry had the IMF not stepped in. It might have been worse.

Second, the Senator makes the point that a year is a very short term in which to seek adjustments, and the Senator is entirely correct. That is an excellent argument for this facility, because this is a long-term facility. I should hope that it would allow the kind of more gradual structural adjustment that I think the Senator seeks.

Mr. MELCHER. I was advised by the person who described the loan to me that there were no restraints placed on it in terms of guiding Zambia to a more prudent position in production of copper. The fact that they have continued and a couple of other countries, whose mines are nationally owned, have continued to produce and sell copper on the world market, extending the period of depressed prices, is extremely foolish.

Zambia should have been required, as the economic constraints on the copper companies we have in the United States, which are privately owned and, therefore, bound by the law of supply and demand, to reduce production.

It was a sad situation for us in Montana, it was a sad situation in Arizona and Utah where copper is produced by privately owned companies, that it has been necessary to reduce the activity and therefore put men and women out of work. But it was the only sensible way to comply with the basic law of supply and demand.

I have been advised a loan made from the International Monetary Fund to Zambia did not carry with it the prudent counseling that any normal banking institution would give to a borrower in order to help them better utilize the loan.

I think in this case it was the wrong loan by the wrong agency, or if it was the right loan by the right agency there should have been constraints that would make Zambia forbear in the continuation of just mining the copper and throwing it onto the market, which continually depresses it and keeps us away from the balance of supply and demand we would like to have.

I thank the Senator from Virginia for yielding to me.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. May I say to the Senator from Montana that I am delighted he brought up the question of Zambia because in the current law there is a prohibition on U.S. aid to Zambia. As recently as the day before yesterday, the Senate adopted an amendment to the International Security Assistance Act to continue the prohibition under that bill for the upcoming year. Yet, as the Senator from Montana pointed out, an agency to which the United States has contributed heavily has made a loan of $340 million to that nation.

So while the Congress puts a prohibition on the one hand against aiding a particular country, the international financial institutions totally disregard that and make huge loans to those nations which the Congress says should not receive U.S. funds.

I think the point made by the able Senator from Montana is a very important one. It dramatizes one of the problems that the Congress faces when it turns over tax funds to those international organizations.

Mr. President, I want to say at the outset that I am not speaking in opposition to the International Monetary Fund. I am speaking to express the view of this Senator that I have great difficulty in supporting a proposal to create a new fund, and that is what this proposal does.

The American taxpayer is now about to be hit with another expensive international financial bill. I refer to S. 2152, the supplemental contribution to the International Monetary Fund for the so-called Witteveen Facility.

The American contribution to this facility will be approximately $1.7 billion. I say "approximately" because there is really no precise estimate as to how much we will be giving. Instead, the funds are expressed in terms of special drawing rights known as SDR's.

These are drawing rights which would arise upon an American contribution to the International Monetary Fund.

The value of SDR's fluctuates in relation to international currency fluctuations.

The able Senator from Illinois, incidentally, just pointed out today that these drawing rights are more valuable than the U.S. dollar, and if we continue as we have been doing in the Congress, in the way of unrestrained spending, adding more new programs, the value of the dollar will continue to go down.

The stated purpose of S. 2152 is to assist countries to meet balance of payments problems caused by the rapid rise in oil prices. This will be done by providing loans to countries that are experiencing serious debt problems.

I might add at this point, does any nation have a more serious balance-of-payment problems than does the United States? I think not.

In reply to a question put by the Senator from Virginia to the manager of the bill as to which countries would be eligible to participate in this new fund if it is established, the reply was that 134 different countries would be eligible.

In reply to a second question—the second question being, which countries do the managers of the bill envision would be the most likely beneficiaries of the fund if it is established?—the manager listed these countries: Peru, Jamaica, Spain, Portugal, Turkey, Egypt, and Zaire.

Now, we should explore the way in which these balance of payments problems emerged.

During past years, many less developed countries (LDC's) made costly capital investments for items such as roadways and buildings, so-called national "infrastructure." These investments, financed by borrowed capital, were often made at the insistence of the IMF, according to the Wall Street Journal.

Simultaneously with these capital commitments, the price of oil began to rise rapidly.

LDC's financed their expansion and their oil bills by massive borrowing from New York-based multinational banks.

These banks were happy to finance these loans because massive inflows of petro dollars from the Middle East had rapidly increased their assets.

As a result, many countries have massive debts which cannot be repaid through domestic production and economic growth. External assistance is considered to be necessary.

The Witteveen Facility is designed to meet this problem.

Crucial questions are raised by this proposal.

First, how will IMF member countries, particularly the United States, benefit from the Witteveen Facility? Second, how will the money be used? Third, who will get the money?

The last two questions can more easily be answered. The persons who will get the money and those who will benefit will be the multinational banks. They will have their loans repaid. Along with the multinational banks, the Arab oil countries will receive the benefit as LDC's will continue to pay a high price for oil.

While the multinational banks and the OPEC countries will benefit, no benefit will go to the American taxpayers.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Taxation and Debt Management of the Senate Finance Committee, I conducted hearings on the question of foreign indebtedness to the United States. Including World War I debts, as of September 30, 1977, there is now $67 billion in outstanding debt owed to the U.S. Government and its agencies. Of this $67 billion, foreign governments owed the United States $38.3 billion; private obligors owed $3.7 billion; and World War I obligations were $25 billion.

Incidentally, after hearings that I conducted on the question of debt to the United States, while Secretary Kissinger was Secretary of State, the Assistant Secretary of State who testified told the press that he found the hearing very boring. I was asked to comment and said I was not at all surprised that he found the hearing very boring, because I find that the State Department has great enthusiasm and great interest whenever Congress is dishing out money for foreign countries, but they find it very, very boring when our country seeks to have those other countries repay the money they owe us.

I was asked, "Aren't you mad at this Assistant Secretary of State for saying that your hearings were boring?"

I said, "Not at all." In every speech I made in the State of Virginia for a year, I told the people of the State of Virginia about this incident. I said:

That dramatizes just what the problem is in Washington. That dramatizes why your taxes are so high. That dramatizes why we have more and more spending. Because these Government officials find it boring when the United States seeks to collect debts justly owed to our country, but they have great enthusiasm when we are dishing out money to 100 different countries around the world, as we have been doing for so long.

There are now more than 215 million inhabitants of the United States. As individuals, each American, will have provided over $300 each for these loan programs.

This does not include our foreign economic and military assistance programs which the Senate Budget Committee has recommended budget authority totaling $11.4 billion in fiscal year 1979—$9.1 for foreign assistance and $2.3 for military assistance.

We cannot afford to pour additional vast sums of money, $1.7 billion, into another foreign aid program.

There should be no doubt about it. This is another new program which will be added upon existing U.S. participation in international financial institutions.

It has been brought out on the Senate floor today by the managers of the bill that the United States already has put into the International Monetary Fund approximately $10 billion, 25 percent of the total of that fund.

We already are also heavily involved with the loan programs of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, known as the World Bank, the International Finance Corporation (IFC), the International Development Association (IDA), the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB), the Asian Development Bank (ADB), and the African Development Fund (AfDF).

The funds to finance these operations do not come out of thin air. They come from the pockets of American taxpayers. They come from the taxes paid by the working men and women of the United States.

For each of these operations, we have committed American dollars in fiscal year 1978 appropriations as follows:

|---|---|
| World Bank | $380 |
| IFC | 38 |
| IDA | 800 |
| IDB | 480 |
| ADB | 218 |
| AfDF | 10 |
| Total | 1,926 |

This is a total of $1.9 billion in fiscal year 1978.

For fiscal year 1979, the budget estimates appropriations of $3.5 billion, an increase of $600 million in one fiscal year.

The United States has been criticized as trying to be the policeman of the world. Now we seek the honor of being the bail-out Nation of the world.

And the victim is the American taxpayer.

Congress should be working to provide our own citizens with financial relief, rather than trying to bail out the economies of nations around the world. It is time to place American interests first when it comes to our foreign policy.

We should also consider whether this type of aid will really help foreign countries.

Most of the loans will not help the hungry in less developed countries.

What these countries need is to increase their agricultural production and exports of agricultural products, thereby reducing their balance of trade deficits.

Instead, this new IMF program will go for huge commercial projects, such as railroads, highways, ports, telecommunications, and electric power.

The dependency of developing world economies upon international lending agencies and banks can hardly be considered to be healthy.

What we are really doing is establishing an international welfare program. If we should have a recession, the ability of poor countries to repay loans would end.

The Witteveen Facility is not the answer to the problems of the less developed countries. Piling another expensive international program on top of the many we now have may help the huge New York and London banks, but it will not solve the problems of the LCD's.

We must keep our eye on the ball, Mr. President. The dominant problem facing the United States is inflation. Almost everyone will admit that. The dominant problem is inflation and the major causes of inflation are the accumulated and accelerated deficits of the Federal Government.

I submit we cannot get inflation under control by going into more foreign spending programs.

This is another program in the international banking field piled on top of all of the other international banking programs.

I am not sure how many of us in Congress realize just how serious is our financial situation as with regard to U.S. Government notes and bonds owned by foreigners.

The reason I have some doubt as to how many of us are aware of the extent of the commitments against our currency is that in a meeting 2 days ago with a number of Members of the Senate and several high administration officials the question came up as to how many Eurodollars are now floating around Europe, and none of us, including the Senator from Virginia, knew the answer to that.

After the meeting I had a long talk with the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Anthony Solomon, and I was somewhat startled to learn the total. We have 375 billion of Eurodollars; in other words, there are $375 billion held by individuals either in the form of currency, bank accounts, or Government bonds, 375 billion in Eurodollars, and then on top of that, aside from that, foreign governments hold notes and bonds of the U.S. Government totalling $120 billion.

Mr. President, I end as I began by saying that I am not opposing the International Monetary Fund. That is not my purpose in speaking today. My purpose in speaking today is to question whether we should go into a new program over and above all the other programs that we have in the foreign field.

For one Senator I find it difficult to justify going into this new program to which our country will be committing $1.7 billion.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator yield for a question at a convenient moment?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I merely wish to ask the distinguished Senator whether or not he intends to call up an amendment today so that the Members may be informed as to prospects for any rollcall votes today.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. No, I do not. I expect to speak for about 20 or 30 minutes and then, as far as the Senator from Virginia is concerned, I will have concluded my activities for today.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator is very responsive. I think the Cloakrooms ought to inform our colleagues that there will be no more rollcall votes today.

This will be carried over until Monday, at which time further amendments will be called up and votes will occur. No rollcall votes will occur, however, before 3 o'clock on Monday, with the exception of any rollcall votes that may be necessary procedurally to establish a quorum.

The Senate has been at work today. It has disposed of the reclamation dams bill and of some amendments to this bill, on which there have been rollcall votes.

I want to express appreciation to my colleagues on both sides of the aisle for their good attendance, for their patience. I say with deep gratitude to my friend from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.) that I appreciate his courtesy in yielding and his very responsive answer to my request.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I am always delighted to yield to the distinguished, able, and outstanding majority leader, the Senator from the great State of West Virginia (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD).

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

(Conclusion of earlier remarks.)

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I shall conclude the debate this afternoon by making a few points that I think should be contained in the RECORD concerning the Witteveen Facility.

First of all, the United States has been both a creditor and debtor to the IMF at various times over the past 30 years. Our country has drawn currencies from the IMF on 23 occasions, most recently in 1972. These drawings totaled some $3.5 billion.

Second, this facility will provide temporary reinforcement for the IMF at this time. It is needed that the IMF can meet balance-of-payments financing needs and promote economic stabilization by member countries in periods of particular financial difficulty and uncertainty.

Third, the Witteveen Facility will strengthen the international monetary system by improving the creditworthiness of those countries adopting adjustment programs. By strengthening the international monetary system the facility will benefit all participants in the international economy, including American industry and the American economy in general.

Fourth, the U.S. economy depends heavily on, and benefits greatly from the international monetary system which provides the framework for financial trade. U.S. exports account for on the order of one out of every eight manufacturing jobs in this country, as well as nearly one-third of our total farm acreage.

Fifth, eighty percent of the international monetary system is composed of U.S. dollars. I think that that is indicative of the stake we have in this matter.

Sixth, there will be no net interest cost to the Treasury on the financing contemplated by this bill since the United States will receive interest rates slightly above the cost of borrowing to the Treasury.

Seventh, for each dollar that is provided by the United States to the Witteveen Facility, the United States receives an equivalent increase in the international reserve assets immediately available to the United States for use in the event of balance-of-payments need.

The total American contribution to the Witteveen Facility, would be $1.8 billion, which is only 17 percent of the total of $10.7 billion which will be provided by all participants. In this connection I point out that the Arab governments of the OPEC cartel have agreed to furnish approximately 50 percent of the total. I think this represents a very significant recognition on the part of these governments that have increased the price of oil six times over its level in October of 1973, that having caused the disequilibrium in the world economy, they, have a responsibility to furnish the necessary credit to see us through.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table showing the contributions to be made by the various countries that have agreed to participate in the creation of the Witteveen facility to the IMF be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, if there be no further amendments to be offered at this time, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMODITY EXCHANGE ACT EXTENSION

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 2391.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the bill from the Senate (S. 2391) entitled "An Act to extend the Commodity Exchange Act, and for other purposes", do pass with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

COMPOSITION AND FUNCTIONS OF COMMISSION; CONFLICT OF INTEREST; LIAISON WITH OTHER AGENCIES; CONFORMING AND TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SECTION 1. Section 2(a) of the Commodity Exchange Act is amended by—

(1) striking out "and (vi)" in paragraph (1) (7 U.S.C. 2) in the definition of the term "commodity trading advisor" and inserting in lieu thereof "(vi) dealers, processors, brokers, and sellers of cash commodities and products thereof, (vii) nonprofit, voluntary membership, general farm organizations which provide advice on the sale and purchase of cash commodities, and (viii)";

(2) inserting "(A)" immediately after the designation of paragraph (2) (7 U.S.C. 4a (a));

(3) striking out in the second sentence of paragraph (2) "a Chairman and four other Commissioners" and inserting in lieu thereof "five Commissioners";

(4) striking out "(A)" and "(B)" in the last sentence of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "(i)" and "(ii)", respectively;

(5) adding at the end of paragraph (2) a new subparagraph as follows:

"(B) The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a member of the Commission as Chairman who shall complete his term as a Commissioner."; An individual may be appointed as Chairman at the same time that person is appointed as a Commissioner. The Chairman shall be the chief administrative officer of the Commission and shall preside at hearings before the Commission. The President may, in his discretion, at any time appoint a different Chairman, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the Commissioner previously appointed as Chairman shall complete his term as a Commissoner.";

(6) striking out in paragraph (5) (7 U.S.C. 4a(d)) ", by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.";

(7) inserting in subparagraph (6)(A)(7) U.S.C. 4a(e)(1)) after "use and expenditures of funds" the words "according to budget categories, plans, programs, and priorities established and approved by the Commission,";

(8) striking out in subparagraph (6)(B) (7 U.S.C. 4a(e)(2)) "of the Commission" and inserting in lieu thereof ", plans, priorities, and budgets approved by the Commission";

(9) inserting "(A)" immediately after the designation of paragraph (7) (7 U.S.C. 4a (f));

(10) adding at the end of paragraph (7) a new subparagraph (B) as follows:

"(B) No Commissioner or employee of the Commission classified as a GS–16 or higher in a position excepted from the competitive service by reason of being of a confidential or policymaking character shall, for a period of one year beginning on the last day of service as such Commissioner or employee (i) make any appearance before, or (ii) make any written or oral communication to, the Commission, or any Commissioner or employee of the Commission, on behalf of any person (other than the United States) on any particular matter that is before the Commission if such last day of service is more than four months after the date of enactment of this subparagraph: Provided, That this restriction shall not apply to an appearance or response to a subpena or any matter of an exclusively personal and individual nature.";

(11) inserting "(A)" immediately after the designation of paragraph (8) (7 U.S.C. 4a (a));

(12) striking out in the first sentence of paragraph (8) "establish a separate office within the Department of Agriculture to be staffed with employees of the Commission for the purpose of maintaining" and inserting in lieu thereof "maintain";

(13) adding at the end of paragraph (8) a new subparagraph (B) as follows:

"(B)(i) The Commission shall maintain communications with the United States Department of the Treasury, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System and the Securities and Exchange Commission for the purpose of keeping such agencies fully informed of Commission activities that relate to the responsibilities of those agencies, for the purpose of seeking the views of those agencies on such activities, and for considering the relationships between the volume and nature of investment and trading in futures contracts under the jurisdiction of the Commission and in securities and/or financial instruments under the jurisdiction of such agencies.

"(ii) When a board of trade applies for designation as a contract market involving transactions for future delivery of any security issued or guaranteed by the United States or any agency thereof, the Commission shall promptly deliver a copy of such application to the Department of the Treasury and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. The Commission may not designate such board of trade as a contract market based on such application until forty-five days from the date the Commission delivers the application to such agencies or until such time as the Commission receives comments from each of such agencies on the application, whichever period is shorter. Any comments received by the Commission from such agencies will be included as part of the public record of the Commission's designation proceeding. In approving, refusing, suspending, or revoking the designation of a board of trade as a contract market involving transactions for future delivery of any security referred to in this section or in considering possible emergency action under section 8a(9) of the Act with respect to such transactions, the Commission shall take into consideration all comments it receives from the Department of the Treasury and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System and shall consider the impact that designation, suspension, revocation, or emergency action might have on the debt financing requirements of the United States Government and the continued efficiency and integrity of the underlying market for government securities.":

(14) striking out in subparagraph (9)(A) (7 U.S.C. 4a(h)(1)) "Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and inserting in lieu thereof "Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry"; and

OPTIONS TRANSACTIONS; TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 2. Section 4c of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 6c) is amended by—

(1) striking out in the last sentence of subsection (a) "not have been disapproved" and inserting in lieu thereof "have been approved";

(2) amending subsection (b) to read as follows: "(b)(1) It shall be unlawful for any person subsequent to the date of the enactment of this subsection to offer to enter into, or confirm the execution of any commodity option transaction involving any commodity regulated under this Act but not specifically set forth in section 2(a) of this Act prior to the enactment of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission Act of 1974, unless expressly permitted under rules or regulations that the Commission, in its discretion, may prescribe subsequent to the date of enactment of this subsection after notice and opportunity for a hearing: Provided, That this subsection shall not apply to any commodity option transaction expressly permitted under rules or regulations prescribed by the Commission, before or after the date of enactment of this subsection, to be offered to be entered into, entered into, or confirmed, to or by, a producer, processor, or commercial user of, or a merchant handling, the commodity involved in the transaction, or the products or byproducts thereof: Provided further, That if the Commission allows commodity option transactions the Commission may set different terms and conditions for different markets.

"(2) As used in this subsection, 'commodity option transaction' means any transaction or agreement which is, is held out to be, is of the character of, or is commonly known to the trade as an 'option', 'privilege', 'indemnity', 'bid', 'offer', 'put', 'call', 'advance guaranty', or 'decline guaranty'.

(3) Nothing contained in this subsection shall affect any rights and obligations arising under any commodity option transaction entered into before the effective date of this subsection.

(4) Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this subsection, the Commission, in its sole discretion and subject to such rules and regulations as it may prescribe without regard to the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act or any other provision of this Act, may permit for a period not to exceed nine months any person domiciled in the United States who on May 1, 1978, was in the business of granting an option on a physical commodity and was in the business of buying, selling, producing, or otherwise utilizing that commodity to continue to grant or issue options on that commodity. Such rules and regulations, among other things, may restrict the distribution of such options to, and the offer and sale of such options by, such futures commission merchants as may be specified by the Commission. Any permission granted pursuant to this subsection may be terminated only after a hearing including a finding that the continuation of such permission is contrary to the public interest: Provided, That pending the completion of such termination proceedings the Commission may suspend the right to offer and sell options of any person whose activities in the Commission's judgment present a substantial risk to the public interest.

"(5) No rule or regulation issued or promulgated pursuant to this subsection (b) shall become effective until (i) the Commission transmits to the House Committee on Agriculture and the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry a copy of such rule or regulation, and (ii) the expiration of ten calendar days of continuous session of Congress after the date of such transmittal without either House of Congress adopting a resolution disapproving such rule or regulation.".

"(n) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Commission may approve rules of futures associations that, directly or indirectly, require persons eligible for membership in such associations to become members of at least one such association, upon a determination by the Commission that such rules are necessary or appropriate to achieve the purposes and objectives of this Act.".

SEC. 21. Any person who sells any commodity (as defined in section 2 of this Act) for export shall, within forty-eight hours after such sale, inform the Commission of (1) the date of such sale, (2) the name and full identity of the commodity sold, (3) the quantity of the commodity sold, (4) the name of the buyer and the country or countries to which the commodity is to be shipped, (5) the sale price, and (6) such other information as the Commission may by regulation require. The Commission shall by regulation prescribe the manner in which the above information shall be transmitted. On the first working day following its receipt, such information shall be made available by public announcement and shall remain available for public inspection for a reasonable time thereafter. The Commission shall prescribe regulations to assure that such information shall be disclosed simultaneously to the public and to protect against any person or firm gaining from premature disclosure.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 22. Except as otherwise provided herein, the provisions of this Act shall become effective October 1, 1978.

Mr. LEAHY. I move that the Senate disagree with the House amendment and agree to the conference requested by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair be authorized to appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer (Mr. SASSER) appointed Mr. TALMADGE, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. CLARK, Mr. STONE, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. DOLE, Mr. BELLMON, and Mr. LUGAR conferees on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

At 10:29 a.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled bill:

H.R. 12426. An Act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide financial assistance for the city of New York.

The enrolled bill was subsequently signed by the Acting President pro tempore (Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD).

At 12:20 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Hackney, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 2391) to extend the Commodity Exchange Act, and for other purposes; requests a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that Mr. FOLEY, Mr. JONES of Tennessee, Mr. POAGE, Mr. DE LA GARZA, Mr. RICHMOND, Mr. BALDUS, Mr. BEDELL, Mr. ENGLISH, Mr. PANETTA, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. FITHIAN, Mr. GLICKMAN, Mr. BROWN of California, Mr. WAMPLER, Mr. MADIGAN, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mr. KELLY, Mr. COLEMAN, and Mr. MARLENEE were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to H.R. 12255, an act to amend the Older Americans Act of 1965 to provide for improved programs for older persons, and for other purposes; agrees to the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that Mr. PERKINS, Mr. BRADEMAS, Mr. KILDEE, Mr. HEFTEL, Mr. HAWKINS, Mr. BIAGGI, Mr. QUIE, Mr. JEFFORDS, and Mr. PRESSLER were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House has passed the following bills in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 3350. An act to promote the orderly development of hard mineral resources in the deep seabed, pending adoption of an international regime relating thereto; and

H.R. 7577. An act to amend the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

At 3 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Berry announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled bill:

H.R. 11832. An act to authorize appropriations under the Arms Control and Disarmament Act for the fiscal year 1979, and for other purposes.

The enrolled bill was subsequently signed by the Acting President pro tempore (Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD).

At 4:20 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Berry, announced that the House agrees to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 920) relating to the disposition of certain recreational demonstration project lands by the State of Oklahoma.

The message also announced that the House has passed the following bill in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 12157. An act to amend and extend the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945.

ORDER THAT H.R. 3350 BE HELD AT THE DESK

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 3350, the deep seabed mining bill, be held at the desk pending further disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The following bill was read twice by its title and referred as indicated:

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. BENTSEN:

S. 3354. A bill for the relief of Taieb Elmourabit; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

S. 2216

At the request of Mr. CURTIS, the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. NELSON) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2216, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code to increase the limitations on charitable deductions and investment tax credits for certain cooperatives and their members.

S. 2388

At the request of Mr. PACKWOOD, the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BELLMON), the Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES), the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. HODGES), the Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. LUGAR), the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON), and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) were added as cosponsors of S. 2388, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide for the exclusion from gross income of certain employer educational assistance programs.

S. 2860

At the request of Mrs. ALLEN, the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2860, the Solar Power Satellite Research, Development, and Demonstration Program Act of 1978.

S. 3326

At the request of Mr. JAVITS, his name was added as a cosponsor of S. 3326, a bill to suspend the duty on freight cars until the close of June 30, 1982.

SENATE RESOLUTION 431

At the request of Mr. RIBICOFF, the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 431, the Lee Metcalf Fair Employment Relations Resolution.

SENATE RESOLUTION 529—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED WAIVING THE CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT

Mr. RIBICOFF, from the Committee on Governmental Affairs, reported the following original resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 529

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of that Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 551, a bill to provide for grants to States for the payment of compensation to persons injured by certain criminal acts and omissions, and for other purposes.

Such waiver is necessary to permit consideration of S. 2640 a bill to reform the civil service system. While the bill authorizes to be appropriated such funds as may be necessary, the Congressional Budget Office estimated the cost of the bill at $13,600,000 for the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978.

The President only submitted the bill to Congress on March 3, and the number of hearings required and the complexity of the subject made it impossible for the Committee to report the bill before the May 15 budgetary deadline.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

FAIR FUND TRANSFER ACT—S. 3156

AMENDMENTS NOS. 3336 THROUGH 3339

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. SCHMITT submitted four amendments intended to be proposed by him to S. 3156, a bill to amend the Consumer Credit Protection Act to provide consumer rights and remedies in electronic fund transfer systems.

FAIR FUND TRANSFER ACT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I am introducing several amendments to S. 3156, the Fair Fund Transfer Act, which concerns electronic fund transfer systems and related matters. This is an unnecessary measure to be considering at this time and may well delay the availability of EFT services. At the very least, the bill should create free-standing law rather than increasing the regulatory authority of the Federal Reserve over an area of activity that only barely exists and in which there is no record of abuse.

The amendments I am introducing would: first, remove Federal Reserve authority to promulgate regulations; second, revise the procedures for error resolution; third, provide a fair and balanced approach to the liability for unauthorized transfers from EFT accounts; and fourth, eliminate the criminal liability provisions of the legislation. These amendments, along with those of Senators TOWER and GARN, are necessary because of the great compliance burden the bill currently places on financial institutions. It is to be hoped that with the acceptance of these and other amendments, the legislation can be transformed into a law that will have beneficial rather than harmful effects on the future of electronic fund transfer development.

The first amendment would strike out section 904 which gives the Federal Reserve Board very broad authority to prescribe regulations under the act.

This is an inappropriate delegation of law writing authority.

Unprecedented discretion is given in section 904(d) for the Board by regulation to cover persons other than financial institutions who are offering electronic fund transfer services. If Congress wants to cover service providers other than financial institutions, it should do so in the statute itself and not delegate such broad authority to an outside agency. By the same token, the acts and practices to be regulated should be done so completely within the four corners of the legislation and not be left to an agency which may create new rights and remedies.

Congress is abdicating its responsibility when it delegates to a bureaucracy the writing of the law as here proposed. Much of the regulatory overkill stems from the complicated regulations issued by various government agencies in response to loosely drawn legislation.

One example may be seen in the Truth in Lending Act delegation of rulemaking authority to the Federal Reserve Board.

Pursuant to that authority, the Board has issued a regulation almost three times as long, and almost three times as technical, as the Act. In addition, the Board has issued 64 Official Board Interpretations, seven of which were later withdrawn and several others amended. The staff of the Board has issued 145 Official Board Interpretations and 1,286 unofficial staff interpretations. That is simply too much for the small businessperson to assimilate and, in fact, too much for any business, whatever the size, to have to master just to avoid highly technical litigation which rarely involves actual damages.

By contrast, under the Fair Credit Reporting Act under which there is no delegation of rulemaking power, there is paucity of litigation and almost no complaints to Congress. Here it is obvious that Congress took the time to decide what it wanted to do and to say what it meant.

To avoid regulatory overkill Congress must write simple and understandable laws and discontinue the practice of delegating broad authority to the bureaucrats to rewrite and extend the reach of legislation passed by Congress. The adoption of this amendment is a step in that direction.

The second amendment would amend section 908 to provide a fair and workable error resolution procedure. This amendment closely follows the error resolution procedure adopted by the House Banking Committee in H.R. 13007, its electronic fund transfer legislation.

Section 908 as currently written is both unfair and unrealistic.

It is unreasonable to trigger an error resolution procedure to which penalties and sanctions attach on an oral notification as section 908 would do. The provision for a written notification 15 days after the oral notification is not helpful because it comes after the time has expired for recrediting the account. Under the Fair Credit Reporting Act written notice of an alleged error is required. This procedure has worked satisfactorily for both the consumers and institutions for a number of years. As is the present practice, most financial institutions would undoubtedly honor an oral request for error correction.

The requirement in the section that a financial institution investigate and recredit an account within 10 days is unrealistic particularly where third parties are involved. Although most institutions should be able to resolve error problems when only they are involved, if there is a third party it could easily take a longer period of time particularly if it is a retailer in a distant city. The National Commission on Electronic Transfers recommended that 45 days be allowed for error correction. Under fair credit billing the creditor has 90 days to correct an error.

Finally, the treble damage penalty provision of the section adds a totally new concept to the enforcement of consumer credit protection laws. The current approach under the Truth in Lending and Fair Credit Billing Acts is to provide the consumer with recovery of either actual damages or where these cannot be established, then a civil penalty of up to $1,000 plus court costs and attorney's fees. This has provided sufficient incentive for consumers and attorneys to bring law suits for vindication and private enforcement of the law. Adding the treble damage feature would be an invitation to harassment.

The amendment strikes a course somewhat in between the provisions of section 908 and the recommendations of the Commission. It recognizes that the customer will be deprived of his or her fund if there is not a prompt resolution of the problem. On the other hand, it takes into consideration that a financial institution should be given sufficient time to investigate and take action on its findings. This is done by allowing 10 days for a correction of an error involving a transaction between only the institution and the account holder and 20 days if the error involves a transaction including a third party, such as a seller of goods. It eliminates the treble damage feature and relies on the civil penalty section of the bill for enforcement.

I urge the adoption of this fair and balanced approach to the problem.

The third amendment would alter section 909 to provide a fair and balanced approach to the burden of loss from an unauthorized transfer.

The amendment provides that the account holder is liable for losses due to an unauthorized transfer if the loss results from:

First, the account holder's fraud;

Second, the account holder's providing the means of access to the third party or writing the access code on the means of access; or

Third, the account holder's failure to notify the institution within a reasonable time of the loss or theft of the means of access.

A $50 limit is placed on the account holder's total liability if the account holder was not involved in a fraudulent act or did not provide the means of access to the third party. All losses will be borne by the institution after the account holder has notified the institution of the loss or theft of the means of access.

This amendment closely follows the liability for unauthorized tranfers provision adopted by the House Banking Committee in H.R. 13007. It also closely follows most of the recommendations of the National Commission on Electronic Fund Transfers.

The current section 909 limits the customer's liability to a maximum of $50 if an EFT card is lost or stolen even though the card holder wrote the access number on the card. This provision is modeled after the liability provisions of the Fair Credit Billing Act applicable to credit cards.

The National Commission on Electronic Fund Transfers pointed out that the credit card model as used in S. 3156 is not applicable for a number of reasons.

The Commission stated that a $50 limit on liability would be inadequate to encourage sufficient care in the protection of the EFT card and identification code. The EFT card holder who suffers a loss in excess of $50 from unauthorized use of his card would probably lose $50 regardless of his care or negligence if the loss occurred before he could report the missing card. If a thief removed $200 from an EFT account, the depository institution would simply deduct $50 and recredit $150 to the depositor's account. There would be no need to bill and collect the forfeited amount, as with credit card accounts. Thus, the careful customer would be penalized by $50 even though he could not have prevented the loss

In the credit card case, the credit card issuer has two means of protecting against theft which would not be available in the debit card case. The credit card issuer protects itself by obligating the merchant to require the card holder to produce identification and sign the transaction slip. This face-to-face confrontation does not exist where the debit card is used at an automated terminal. Thus, currently debit card issuers are protecting themselves through PIN or code numbers. This security device is compromised if the customer writes the number on the access instrument. For this reason, the National Commission recommended that the customer be held liable for his gross negligence in compromising the security system. This is the basic change in the amendment.

Another difference between the credit card model and the debit card situation is that the credit card issuer can limit the extent of its potential loss through credit limits. This is not the case in a deposit account because the extent of possible loss is the amount of funds deposited in accounts accessible to the debit card. Although it is theoretically possible to have limitations on the amounts which may be withdrawn through debit cards, the provisions of S. 3156 imposing liability for the failure of the institution to honor the customer's transfer order, puts a cloud over the ability of the institution to establish such security limitations.

The losses that S. 3156 would shift to the financial institutions resulting from the negligence of the careless customer would ultimately be borne by consumers in general. The financial institutions and the Federal Reserve are now considering a new practice of having the financial institutions charge each customer fees according to the actual cost of the service. This would mean that financial institutions would pass on these losses to all debit card customers. Lower income consumers could loose out because the liability ceiling may cause a financial institution to limit the distribution to current customers who have proven records of reliability.

Mr. President, the amendment strikes a fair balance. It places the risk of most losses upon the financial institution particularly those which cannot be avoided by the consumer. On the other hand, it places on the blatantly careless customer the risk of loss from his own gross negligence. I urge the adoption of this amendment.

The fourth amendment would delete section 916(a) of S. 3156, the Fair Fund Transfer Act, which imposes a fine of not more than $5,000 and imprisonment of not more than 1 year for willful violations of the bill.

There is no justification to support this criminal liability section of the bill which makes everything that is in the statute, if not followed, a violation of law punishable in the U.S. district courts. This would expose a businessperson to a fine of up to $5,000 and imprisonment of not more than 1 year for failing to give a disclosure as required by the bill. It would give the FBI jurisdiction to investigate most financial institutions in the country to determine whether those institutions had complied with the EFT Consumer Protection Code. It is questionable whether the Federal courts or the FBI should be tied up in this kind of trivia and whether the business community should be exposed to criminal penalties for trivial violations.

The Chief Justice of the United States has warned Congress to be mindful of the judicial impact of the enactment of legislation such as this. Congress in effect is creating a whole new series of Federal crimes which are trivial in nature and should not be tried as major misdemeanors in the U.S. district courts.

I ask unanimous consent that these amendments be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendments were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 3336

On page 4, line 18, strike out the comma and insert in lieu thereof a semicolon.

On page 4, strike out line 19.

AMENDMENT NO. 3337

Beginning with page 13, line 16, strike out all through page 17, line 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"§ 908. Correction of errors

"(a) For the purpose of this section, an error consists of—

"(1) an unauthorized electronic fund transfer;

"(2) an incorrect electronic fund transfer from or to a consumer account;

"(3) the omission from a periodic statement of an electronic fund transfer affecting a consumer account which should have been included;

"(4) a computational error by the financial institution;

"(5) the receipt of an incorrect amount of money from an automated teller machine;

"(6) a financial institution's failure to comply with an account holder's request for any information or documentation required by this title concerning any electronic fund transfer in the account;

"(7) a financial institution's failure to stop payment on a preauthorized transfer from an account when properly instructed to do so; or

"(8) the failure to make an electronic fund transfer to or from an account.

"(b) Every financial institution at which any account subject to this title is maintained shall notify each account holder of the identity of a person or office and the address and telephone number at which the account holder may, in person, by phone, or in writing notify the institution of any error in the account. In order for the financial institution to be subject to the duties and liabilities imposed by this title with respect to the correction of errors, such notice to the institution must include the information required under subsection (c) and be mailed, telephoned, or delivered in person within sixty days of the last day of the time period covered by the periodic statement which relates to the alleged error, but the failure of an account holder to give such notice, or to give such notice within that period, does not affect any rights or remedies such holder may otherwise have. No notice or information given orally (whether in person or by telephone) to a financial institution by any individual shall create any liability on the part of the institution under this section, other than that arising out of the duty of the institution to inform such person of the requirement that the notice or information be confirmed in writing, unless such information is confirmed in writing, signed by or on behalf of the account holder, and mailed or otherwise delivered to the institution within the time required by this subsection.

"(c) Any notice of an error under this section shall set forth or otherwise reasonably enable the financial institution to identify the name and account identification of the account holder, and shall describe or identify the error which the account holder believes has been made.

"(d) Except as provided in subsections (e) and (g), if the financial institution determines that an error did occur, it shall promptly, but in no event more than one business day after such determination or eleven business days after notification, whichever is earlier, correct the error, subject to section 909, including the crediting of interest where applicable.

"(e) If a financial institution receives notice of an error in the manner and within the time period specified in subsection (b), it may, in lieu of the requirements of subsection (d), provisionally credit the consumer account for the amount alleged to be in error, subject to section 909, including interest where applicable, pending the conclusion of its investigation. Such investigation, shall be concluded not later than forty-five days after receipt of notice of the error. During the pendency of the investigation, the consumer shall have full use of the funds provisionally credited. Such provisional credit shall be made within ten business days after receiving such notice if the error involves a transaction between only the institution and the account holder, and within twenty business days if the error involves a transaction including a third party, such as a seller of goods.

"(f) If, as a result of an error on the part of the institution, any electronic fund transfer or payment of checks or other instrument or order is refused, the financial institution shall notify each payee that such was the case, and shall pay or reimburse any charges incurred by the account holder as a result of such error or nonpayment.

"(g) If the financial institution asserts, after its investigation pursuant to this section, that an error did not occur, it shall deliver or mail to the account holder an explanation of its findings within three business days after the conclusion of its investigation, and upon request of the holder, deliver or mail to the holder reproductions of relevant documents which the financial institution relied on to conclude that such error did not occur.

AMENDMENT NO. 3338

Beginning with page 17, line 3, strike out all through page 19, line 9, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"§ 909. Liability for unauthorized transfers

"(a) An institution is not liable to an account holder for a loss to his account if—

"(1) the loss is by means of an electronic fund transfer which is the result of fraud in which the account holder has participated,

"(2) an account holder provides the means of access to the account to a third party, or writes or otherwise discloses the identifying access code or number on the card or other means of access, and the loss to the account results from an electronic fund transfer initiated, directly or indirectly, by the third party before the account holder notifies the institution that such third party no longer is to have access to the account and authorizes the institution to take the necessary steps to eliminate the access, or

"(3) an account holder has failed to notify the institution within a reasonable time after the account holder knows of the loss or theft of a card or other means of access, except that unless paragraph (1) or (2) applies, the institution shall be liable to the account holder for loss in excess of $50 that could not have been avoided had the account holder made timely report of the loss or theft.

"(b) Except as provided by subsection (a), an institution shall be liable to an account holder for any loss to such holder's account resulting from an unauthorized electronic fund transfer of funds from the account if—

"(1) the means of access for such transfer was not a card or other means of access issued in accordance with sections 905 and 911 and accepted by the account holder;

"(2) such transfer of funds occurs after the institution has been notified of the loss or theft of a card or other means of access;

"(3) the institution has not provided a method whereby the user of the card or other means of access can be identified as the person who is authorized to access the account by electronic fund transfer;

"(4) the institution has not furnished the account holder with written notice of the account holder's potential liability for losses in a form which sets forth the pertinent conditions clearly and in readily understandable language so that the account holder could reasonably be expected to have noticed it and understood its meaning; or

"(5) the institution has not furnished the account holder with a telephone number of the institution which any authorized user of the card or other means of access may use to notify such institution in the event of loss or theft of the card or other means of access.

"(c) Except as provided in subsection (a), providing for no liability on the part of the institution, and subsection (b), providing for full liability on the part of an institution, an institution is liable for all losses to the holder of a consumer account in excess of $50 resulting from unauthorized electronic fund transfers with respect to that account.

"(d) For the purpose of subsections (a)(2) and (b)(2), an institution is notified if an account holder or person acting on behalf of such holder takes such steps as may be reasonably required in the ordinary course of business to provide such institution with the pertinent information, whether or not any particular officer, employee, or agent of such institution does, in fact, receive such information.

"(e) In any action to enforce liability on the part of an institution for losses to any consumer account resulting from an electronic fund transfer, the burden of proof shall be upon the institution to show that such transfer of funds was authorized or, if the transfer of funds was unauthorized, then the burden of proof shall be upon the institution to show that a condition set forth in subsection (a) applies, or that a condition set forth in subsection (b) does not apply.

"(f) Nothing in this section imposes liability upon an account holder for losses resulting from an unauthorized electronic fund transfer in excess of the holder's liability for losses under other applicable law or under any agreement with the institution.

"(g) In the event of a transaction which involves both an unauthorized electronic funds transfer and an extension of credit as defined in section 103(e) of this Act pursuant to an agreement between the consumer and the financial institution to extend such credit to the consumer in the event the consumer's account is overdrawn, the limitation on the consumer's liability for such transaction shall be determined solely in accordance with this section.

CIVIL SERVICE LAW REFORM—S. 2640

AMENDMENTS NOS. 3340 THROUGH 3381

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. MATHIAS submitted 42 amendments intended to be proposed by him to S. 2640, a bill to reform the civil service laws.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT AMENDMENTS—S. 2152

AMENDMENT NO. 3390

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. ABOUREZK (for himself, Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD, Mr. BAYH, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. MCGOVERN, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. WEICKER, and Mr. LEAHY) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to S. 2152, a bill to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act to authorize the United States to participate in the Supplementary Financing Facility of the International Monetary Fund.

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

● Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to give notice that a public hearing has been scheduled for Tuesday, August 8, 1978, at 9:30 a.m., in room 2228 Dirkson Senate Office Building, on the following nomination:

Harry E. Claiborne, of Nevada, to be U.S. district judge for the district of Nevada vice Bruce R. Thompson, retiring.

Any persons desiring to offer testimony in regard to this nomination shall, not later than 24 hours prior to such hearing, file in writing with the committee a request to be heard and a statement of their proposed testimony.

This hearing will be before the full Judiciary Committee.●

SUBCOMMITTEE ON INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

● Mr. MUSKIE. The Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations of the Committee on Governmental Affairs, on Wednesday, August 2, will hold a hearing on S. 3277, the Small Communities Act of 1978.

The hearing will begin at 9:30 a.m. in room 6202 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. Senator DANFORTH will chair the hearing.

Any person interested in submitting a statement for the record should send it to the subcommittee office in room 508 of the Carroll Arms Hotel.●

COMMITTEE ON HUMAN RESOURCES

● Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Committee on Human Resources will hold hearings on S. 2645, the "National Art Bank Act of 1978," on Tuesday and Wednesday, August 22 and 23, 1978, commencing each day at 9:30 a.m. The hearings will be held in room 4232 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

COLLEGE TUITIONS AND THE MIDDLE-CLASS SQUEEZE

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, before the Senate begins its consideration of the Tuition Tax Relief Act, I want to emphasize once again the difficulties middle-income families are having in sending their children to college.

Increasing college costs, higher prices, and a growing tax burden are making it more and more difficult for middle-income students to attend college.

There is no doubt in my mind that a growing number of young Americans are being prevented from obtaining a college education because of the increasing costs.

In the past few years, the cost of a college education has skyrocketed.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, total annual college costs increased approximately 75 percent between 1967 and 1976. However, tuition and required fees, the only expenses which will be eligible for the tuition tax credit, have increased at a much faster rate.

According to the National Center for Education Statistics, the average tuition and fees at a private university increased 93 percent between 1967 and 1976, from $1,297 to $2,505. For a public university, tuition and fees also increased 93 percent during the same 10-year period, from $283 to $549.

These tuition costs will continue to increase. According to the College Entrance Examination Board, the average annual total cost of a private university for the upcoming school year will be $5,110. For a public university, the average annual cost will be $3,054 for the 1978–79 school year. For a student entering college this fall, the total 4-year cost will be an estimated $17,500 for a public university and $30,000 for a private college. And if a parent has a 1-year-old child today, it has been estimated that it will cost $47,000 to send the child to a public university and $82,000 for a private university in the 1990's.

The administration and the Congressional Budget Office have argued that a tuition tax credit is not necessary because total college costs have not risen as fast as median income. According to a recent CBO report, total college costs increased 75 percent and median family income increased 78 percent between 1967 and 1976. The administration has seized upon these figures as proof that the average family is no worse off today than it was 10 years ago.

But the administration and CBO are totally ignoring an extremely important fact—that the tax burden on the average family has increased substantially during this same period and middle-income families have less disposable income to spend on a college education for their children.

According to a study by the Library of Congress Congressional Research Service, the tax burden on median income families with college-age children increased 135.4 percent between 1967 and 1976, as the following table shows:

AVERAGE TAXES AND MEDIAN INCOME, 1967 AND 1976

|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1967 | 7,923 | 684 | 290 | 404 | 1,378 | 6,545 |
| 1976 | 14,164 | 1,395 | 829 | 1,020 | 3,244 | 10,920 |
| Percent change from 1967 to 1976 | 78.8 | 103.9 | 185.9 | 152.5 | 135.4 | 66.8 |

As this study shows, the after-tax income of median income families increased only 66.8 percent, and did not keep pace with the 75-percent increase in total college costs or the 93-percent increase in tuition and fees.

In addition, the percentage of after-tax median income required for tuition and fees has increased 16.3 percent at public colleges and 15.7 percent at private colleges over the last 10 years, as the following table shows:

MEDIAN FAMILY INCOME, AFTER TAX MEDIAN FAMILY INCOME, AND COLLEGE TUITIONS

| Year | Median family income: Families with 18- to 24-yr-olds | Median family income: After tax | Tuition and required fees: Public | Tuition and required fees: Private | Tuition and fees as percent of after-tax MFI: Public | Tuition and fees as percent of after-tax MFI: Private |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1967 | $7,923 | $6,545 | $283 | $1,297 | 4.3 | 19.8 |
| 1976 | 14,164 | 10,920 | 549 | 2,505 | 5.0 | 22.9 |
| Percent change, 1967–76 | 78.8 | 66.8 | 93.9 | 93.1 | 16.3 | 15.7 |

These figures clearly show the Federal Government is taking more money away from the average families of this country through higher taxes and inflation. The tuition tax credit is designed to reduce the average tax burden and allow taxpayers to keep more of their own money to spend on a college education for their children.

These increasing costs have had a considerable impact on the ability of middle-income students to attend college. According to Census Bureau figures, the enrollment rate of middle-income students has declined in the last 10 years. In fact, while the enrollment rate at the lowest income level has increased slightly, the enrollment rates of all other income levels have declined in the last 10 years.

Mr. President, there are millions of families today who are neither affluent enough to afford the high cost of college nor considered poor enough to qualify for the many different Government assistance programs their taxes make possible.

We are rapidly approaching a situation in this country where only the very affluent and the very poor will be able to attend college. The group in the middle—the very taxed—will be unable to afford it.

Mr. President, a tuition tax credit is the simplest and most equitable way to provide middle-income families relief from mounting college costs. A tuition tax credit will allow people to keep more of their own hard-earned money rather than send it to Washington. With a tuition tax credit, there is no administrative overhead, no forms to fill out, and no need to beg, plead poverty, or apply to the big bureaucrat on the banks of the Potomac.

Working Americans, caught in the middle, do not want a Government handout. They merely want to keep more of what they earn to spend on something as basic as the right to send their own children to college.

Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD articles describing the middle-class squeeze.

The articles follow:

SCARED BY COSTS OF COLLEGE

(By Robert J. Christian)

WILTON, CONN.—I'm scared.

Scared because even though I make more than $25,000, I pay out $12,300 of my net income for college for two sons per year. You say it can't be done? I say you're nearly right.

Elizabeth W. Suchar, director of financial aid services for the College Entrance Examination Board, which sponsors the Scholastic Aptitude Test (S.A.T.) and other widely used admissions tests, says $12.3 billion is available in aid for students in 1978. For all eligible students? Where is her ivory tower?

I know money is available for the poor, and rightly so. And there are state senatorial scholarships and union funds and special-services aids for nursing programs, etc., but what about us in the middle, middle-income class? Those of us with no special strings to pull?

True, it's been three years since I've tried to get any of this aid, but when I did none of eight colleges would even let me fill out an application.

Maybe the answer is to take out a Federal loan and not pay it back as many have done. My taxes help pay for the derelictions of conscience.

Some editorial writers say we should tough it out and pay up. The President thinks $250 off our income tax would suffice. The Congress said no to even that ridiculous figure, and as usual has no positive idea to go in its place. But then what do any of the above know about us in the new middle-class strata with no strings to pull?

I'm not asking you to cry for me, but I am asking you to get concerned now if you expect any colleges to be there when your kids are ready to go.

With fewer babies being born, coupled with a continuing 6-to-8 percent a year inflation rate, college costs will continue to jump rapidly and eliminate even more prospects for their classrooms.

That will force more colleges to become economically expendable. We will have empty buildings and unkempt campuses. It's happending already in grade schools throughout the country.

I'm scared. You should be too!

WANT TO SEND YOUR CHILD TO COLLEGE? START SAVING

If you've got a newborn baby, start setting aside $1,500 a year. Put that money in a savings account every year for 18 years. Then, if all goes well, you may be able to send your child through four years of college at a state university in 1995.

Astounding but true, say the people at Oakland financial Group, a Charlotteville (Va.) financial counseling service.

According to a formula devised by this group, a college degree in 1995 will cost a total of $47,330 at a state college or $83,830 at a private one.

This earthshaking prediction is based on simple arithmetic. This is how it works:

Assume your child is 10 years old and will be entering a university in eight years. By taking today's average cost per year at a state school, $4,000, or $7,000 at a private one, and factoring in a 6 per cent annual rate of inflation, you can project that by the time your child graduates it will cost you $27,270 or $47,720. That bargain includes room, board, tuition and miscellaneous outlays.

To prepare for sending that 10-year-old through college you would have to start now, saving $2,300 a year for eight years if the child is to go to a public college, or $4,080 a year for eight years if you have a private school in mind.

The annual savings rate is based on cash after taxes that is estimated to grow at 5 per cent a year.

To read the chart for both state and private colleges, find the age of your child in the left-hand column. The next column, "Four-Year Cost", estimates the total outlay for a degree program based on a 6 per cent inflation rate.

The third column, "Annual Savings Required," details how much cash after taxes you must deposit in a savings account, with a minimum 5 per cent return, every year until your child enters college.

If you're asking how you can afford the skyrocketing cost of college, the answers are few. Start saving what you can now. Set up short-term trusts or custodial accounts in your child's name so the tax bite on your savings is reduced. Diligently investigate loan and scholarship programs. And if all this doesn't help, encourage your child to be a plumber.

| Age of child | State colleges: 4-yr cost | State colleges: Annual savings required | Private schools: 4-yr cost | Private schools: Annual savings required |
| 1 | $47,330 | $1,570 | $82,830 | $2,750 |

WITH COLLEGE COSTS RISING TUITION X 12 EQUALS A MAJOR SQUEEZE

(By Richard Phalon)

There may have been a time when raising children really was cheaper by the dozen, but that was before tuition and living costs generally tore through the refectory roof.

Take Jean and Tom Hoffman. They have a dozen children, ranging in age from 25 to 12. Jean is a high school teacher, Tom is an accountant and they are going broke on a combined income of about $42,000 a year.

It takes around $30,000 in after-tax dollars just to cover such routine items as the food bills, electricity, heat and mortgage payments on the Hoffmans' six-bedroom frame bungalow in Forest Hills, Queens.

The big squeeze on the budget is education. Two of the children already have their degrees, but there are three in college now.

two in high school, three in grade school. The way their timetable shapes up, the Hoffmans will have at least one child—and in some years three or four—on campus through 1986.

ONLY MARGINAL AID

The Hoffmans are painfully aware of how rapidly tuition costs are rising, and despite the size of their family they have been able to get only modest scholarship help.

John Hoffman, 24, was awarded $1,500 in grants while working himself through a five-year pharmacy course at Duquesne University, but he still has about $10,000 in tuition loans hanging over his head. The others were able to get on-campus jobs, but no other direct financial aid.

Tom Hoffman thinks his family is caught in a typical middle class bind.

"Our kids are good students," he said, "but not outstanding enough to have qualified for academic scholarships." "And in terms of need," he continued, "our income is supposed to put us among the most affluent groups in society, even though we're broke."

It's not that the Hoffmans haven't tried to shake the academic money tree. Mrs. Hoffman, who is a guidance counsellor and English teacher at the Thomas A. Edison Vocational and Technical High School in Jamaica, Queens, knows more about where the money is than most parents.

Yet even the research she did into such possibilities as a Disabled American Veterans scholarship—Mr. Hoffman carries a disability from his Army service in World War II—didn't pan out.

"The competition is fierce," Mrs. Hoffman said.

"Our daughter Mary has almost a 3.8 average at Hunter and she couldn't make either the D.A.V. or the National Merit," Mr. Hoffman said.

UPSET BY ANALYSIS

Mrs. Hoffman is particularly incensed at the amount of money the College Scholarship Service estimates her family should be able to provide for the childrens' education. The service's need analyses—based on financial-aid forms filed by the family—are used by most colleges, governmental agencies, and other sources of scholarship help to establish how much money a student requires to get by.

The scholarship service is an arm of the College Entrance Examination Board in Princeton, which administers the Scholastic Aptitude Tests taken by college-bound high school juniors and seniors. The College Scholarship Service's financial aid form has its counterpart in the family financial statement used by the other aptitude analyzing organization in the field, the American College Testing Service.

Mrs. Hoffman argues that the C.S.S. support formula is biased against big middle-class families. "Once they look at our income," she said, "it's no dice—no matter how many people we have to spend it on."

CHILDREN HOLD JOBS

Life at 68-25 Manse Street is comfortable enough, but by no means luxurious. All of the children in high school—following a pattern set by their older brothers and sisters—work part-time in such places as Waldbaum's or a nearby Chinese restaurant. Vacations are "occasional." A good chunk of the mortgage the Hoffmans took out a couple of years ago to fix up the house they have lived in since 1957 has in fact gone for education.

The Hoffmans' equity in the house is considered an asset on the college financial aid statement and hence a sign of financial strength. Other elements that go into the need equation are living costs—they are based on a "low" budget as computed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics—and, of course, such items as family size and the number of children in college.

Taxable income is another big variable in the computer mix and as that figure goes up, so does the amount of money a family is expected to provide.

A couple with one of three children in college and adjusted income of $15,000 a year, according to Joe Paul Case, associate director of the College Scholarship Service, would be expected to provide the student with $590 a year.

The same size family with adjusted income of $25,000 a year would be expected to provide $2,610 a year. At $45,000 the family would be expected to put up $7,770.

DEFENDS THE FAIRNESS

The amount of family help expected declines with the number of children in college, and Mr. Case argues that the system is as fair "as rational analysis can make it."

Taking the Hoffmans as a hypothetical case, Mr. Case estimated their children would be entitled to a "healthy x amount of aid," if they were accepted by an Ivy League college where total costs now run to around $7,000 a year. They might find "some aid" at some state universities and "none" at the City University of New York.

In fact—income from his job and John's $1,500 in grants aside—the Hoffman children have had to rely entirely on New York State-guaranteed loans obtained through private banks, their parents, and whatever they could make during high school and summer vacations to cover their costs.

Looking ahead, Jean Hoffman said she thinks her children will be able to afford only state or city colleges unless they are lucky enough to get "some enormous scholarship help."

"I'm a very optimistic person," she said. "I think it's going to be very difficult, but I have hope that we'll get them all through.

CAMPUS QUANDARY: AS COLLEGE COSTS SOAR, MIDDLE-CLASS FAMILIES ARE CAUGHT IN SQUEEZE—THEY ARE TOO RICH FOR HELP AND TOO POOR TO LAUGH; IF THEY SAVE, THEY LOSE

(By Mitchell C. Lynch)

Harvey and Dorothy Doss, a Michigan couple making about $26,000 a year, thought they had a formula for sending their four children through college. With scholarship aid and other financial assistance, they figured that their own outlays could be held to $3,000 a year per child.

Barbara, their oldest, went off to Kenyon College in Gambier, Ohio, where she now is a sophomore. Tuition, room, board and other fees total about $5,700. She got enough scholarship and other aid to bring her parents' bills down to $3,650, including spending money. "That's more than we figured on," Dorothy Doss said, "but we think we can still do it."

Now, however, the Dosses have run into trouble. Their next oldest, Jean, has been accepted for admission next fall to Syracuse University. Tuition, room, board and fees there total $5,770. Like her sister, Jean applied for enough financial help to bring the family's expense down to $3,C00. Syracuse said no. It wouldn't come close to what the Dosses wanted.

The reason: At $26,000 a year, the Dosses have too big an income to qualify for so much aid from Syracuse. But they figure that without that much aid, they can't afford to send Jean to Syracuse.

COSTS UP 70 PERCENT SINCE 1970

Like millions of other American families making from $12,000 to, say, $40,000 a year, the Dosses are caught in a tightening squeeze in higher education. Because of the skyrocketing costs of college, these families need help. Because of their incomes, they can't get it—at any rate, not enough of it.

Since 1970, total costs of college, not counting spending money, have climbed more than 70 percent, to a median of $2,790 a year at state-run schools and $4,568 at private colleges, according to the College Scholarship Service, the branch of the College Entrance Examination Board that establishes the generally accepted standards on financial-aid eligibility. Parents usually file income and savings statements with the service, which makes the statements available to the colleges.

There are a variety of college, state, federal and company aid programs designed to help meet the soaring costs. They are base on need, which means that the lion's share goes to students from lower-income families, with little left over for the middle class. (It is assumed that upper-income families don't need any help.)

Generally, bright students with grades of B-minus and up from families making less than $12,000 a year are eligible for enough scholarship aid, low-interest loans and straight grants to carry them through all four years without dipping into the family wallet. Starting at about $12,000, the higher your income the harder it is to get help. The crunch really begins at $20,000 a year. Those making at least $30,000 can rely on little outside help at all, except for the local Rotary, Kiwanis or Woman's Club scholarship, which usually isn't based on need.

An exception to all the difficulty should be noted: The straight-A student active in school affairs can get plenty of aid, no matter what his family's income, authorities say. "Those kids don't apply to college; they get recruited by the colleges," a high-school guidance counselor says.

But for the families of most college-bound students, the already tight financial situation is likely to get worse. Oakland Financial Group Inc., a personal-finance consulting firm, estimates that the higher-education bill for today's 14-year-old high-school freshman will be $5,522 a year at a state college and $9,665 at a private university. For today's 8-year-old, the firm calculates, the annual cost will be $7,677 at a state college and $12,662 at a private one. These projections don't include pin money and they assume no increase in the inflation rate.

"ADMIT-DENY" FORMULA

Clearly, college-financing problems have reached "worrisome proportions," says John Kemeny, president of Dartmouth College. He says that most schools, unable to provide all the help that families seek, end up adopting what he calls a destructive "admit-deny" formula; that is, they admit the students but deny them the required financial assistance. "It's tantamount to denying admission in the first place," he says.

Dartmouth, Harvard and some other colleges are trying to do something about this. Dartmouth has a "custom-tailored" financial aid program intended to make sure that any student admitted for academic reasons won't have to opt out for financial reasons. "It's the opposite of the admit-deny formula," Mr. Kemeny says.

After seeing a 10% drop in middle-income students last year, Harvard started a pilot program of low-interest loans—8%, compared with about 12% for conventional loans—to families earning between $15,000 and $50,000 a year. The loans are repayable over six years.

At least five other schools are phasing in loans similar to Harvard's and carrying interest rates of 8% to 8¾%. They are Amherst, Bryn Mawr, Cornell University's School of Hotel Administration, Pomona College and Stanford. Yale has come up with a program it calls "tuition postponement option," which allows a student to repay loans after college at a rate based on his income.

One reason that more people are feeling the higher-education squeeze is simply that more people are demanding a college education. The Conference Board, a nonprofit economic-research organization, estimates college enrollment at 11 million and climbing.

compared with just three million in 1960. "More people expect to send their children so more people are aware that it is costly," says Michael McPherson, an economist at Williams College who studies higher-education costs.

William Brennan of Longmeadow, Mass., is more than aware of the situation; he is bitter about it. "Sometimes I think my kids would be better off if I made less money," he says. Mr. Brennan, the father of three children, is a section manager at a roller-chain plant in nearby Springfield. He makes between $30,000 and $35,000 a year. By most people's reckoning, that's a good paycheck. Mr. Brennan says, "I may be a good manager at the plant, but I must be a poor manager at home." He has little savings in the bank.

After paying federal and state taxes, the Brennans are hit with more than $2,000 a year in mortgage payments, another $2,000 for property taxes and "one heck of a lot of money" for such necessities as food, heating fuel and insurance. (The Brennans own two cars—a 1966 Chevrolet and a 1971 Oldsmobile, both paid for.) Indeed, a rundown of the Brennan family ledger shows little surplus, "and we don't live the high life," Mr. Brennan says.

Still, his income precludes any state, federal or college financial aid for the Brennan's son, Bill, completing his second year at Holy Cross College in Worcester, Mass. The tab for tuition, room, board and "pocket money, which really builds up," is more than $5,000 a year, Mr. Brennan says. Last summer Bill made about $1,200 as a clerk in a bookstore and used some of his meager savings. This brought the Brennan family's tab down to $3,600.

Mr. Brennan borrowed this from his company's credit union at 10% interest to be paid in one year, in monthly installments of about $320. The crunch, though, will come next year when the Brennans' daughter Sheila, an honor student in high school, also tries to attend Holy Cross. If she can't get financial aid and if costs rise as expected, Mr. Brennan could be facing a monthly bill of well over $750, or more than $9,000 a year, for the two collegians.

"What really gets me is Sheila gets good marks in school because she wants to get scholarships," Mr. Brennan says. "But if she can't get a scholarship because of my income, then what kind of incentive is that for a kid to study hard?"

A CASE OF OVERREACH?

While many may sympathize with the plight of the Dosses and Brennans, some others don't. Many college administrators and other authorities say the situation isn't nearly so bad as it's often painted. For one thing, they say, some parents could be suffering a classic case of middle-class overreach by trying to send two or more of their children through college at the same time, without being willing to make such personal sacrifices as remortgaging their homes or selling one of the family cars.

"I'm alarmed at the changing attitude in this country," says Jonathan D. Fife, associate director of a higher-education study group at George Washington University in Washington. "People in the middle class used to be willing to give up anything to help, but today they won't give up anything."

Richard Z., a $25,000-a-year store manager outside Los Angtles, bemoaning the high cost of putting his two sons through college, says he can't contribute anything from his personal savings account because "we finally have enough to renovate our basement." The renovation includes transforming the basement into a 1920s-style speak-easy. "We entertain a lot," Mr. Z. says.

Parents who have conscientiously saved money for college are frequently jarred to find the savings taken into account by college-aid administrators. The savers are entitled to less assistance than families who haven't salted away a penny.

"I was really surprised when I found that out," says Mrs. Victoria Lodoly of St. Louis, whose two sons commute to St. Louis University. She says she and her husband, George, a brewer for Anheuser-Busch, "always tried to put a little away because we knew our children would be going to college some day." One of her sons received a small scholarship, but neither was entitled to other help, principally because the Lodolys' income is around $30,000 a year and they have a savings account.

Some observers discount the talk of overreach and unwillingness to sacrifice. "We're talking about the term liquidity" says William Cavanaugh, an official of the College Scholarship Service. "People appear to be richer, but their resources aren't liquid, they're tied up with bills and other payments." What's more, the term "middle class" covers a wide area, says Nicholas Ryan, financial aid director at Grinnell College, situated amid cornfields outside Des Moines. "What about the farmer? What's he supposed to do, sell a couple of acres a year to put his children through college?"

DECLARATIONS OF INDEPENDENCE

One way to fight back is to declare your children independent. A student who lives away from home can use his own income, not his parents', as the basis for seeking financial aid. This technique hasn't spread much. The College Scholarship Service says the percentage of students declared self-supporting has risen—but only slightly, and mainly because more people in their middle or late 20s are beginning college these days.

Cutting the apron strings can pay off, says John McGrath of Springfield, Mass. His daughter Sherry wasn't eligible for financial aid when she entered Framingham (Mass.) State College three years ago. She married a student at the school, and now, her father says, "she can get financial help from the school or state if she wants."

Most authorities agree that, severe or not, the middle-class squeeze is forcing parents to become more selective—and realistic—about the colleges their children can attend. Typical of such families are the Dosses of Michigan. After denial of aid from Syracuse, daughter Jean has decided to go to the University of Michigan, which is in her home town of Ann Arbor and has a tuition of $904 a year for state residents. Still, her parents, Harvey Doss, a pilot for an air-freight carrier, and Dorothy, a nurse, say they are "a little crushed."

Michigan is a good school, "but we always felt that part of the education process was to live away from home, to meet new people in a different environment," Mrs. Doss says. "I guess we'll have to give that up."

MIDDLE-CLASS TRAP: TOO POOR FOR COLLEGE, TOO RICH FOR HELP

(By Gene I. Maeroff)

Among hundreds of thousands of unsuccessful applicants for college scholarships this year was a Dartmouth freshman from Florida whose schoolteacher parents make $32,500 between them. They have a $60,000 home (mortgaged), $8,000 in savings and an older son already in college. On the basis of a formal evaluation of his family's financial circumstances, the entering freshman was told he and his parents could afford the $6,800 it will cost to keep him at Dartmouth next year. The only help available through Dartmouth was a $1,500 Federally insured loan at 7 per cent annual interest the college arranged.

The Florida family is, like many others, feeling a new kind of squeeze. It is too affluent to qualify for college aid, but not wealthy enough to pay the bills without personal sacrifice. Stories about youngsters turning down Ivy League acceptances to go to less expensive, less prestigious institutions are becoming commonplaces.

There are several reasons for the phenomenon, startling in a society that has generally held that the "better" an education, the more likely it is to guarantee a ticket to the better life. One, of course, is that there is simply not enough student aid to go around.

Another is the result of a trend of the last decade. Priority is given to the neediest. No matter how tough things are for the family with an apartment on Central Park West and a summer home in the Hamptons, things are worse north of 110th Street, and families with incomes around and above 1973's national median of $13,622 find scholarship and grant money generally unavailable.

In 1973, 90 per cent of the aid being channeled to college students through the United States Office of Education was going to young people from families with annual incomes of less than $15,000. These Federal funds are 40 per cent of $6.4-billion available to college students from all public and private sources. And of the $6.4-billion, two-thirds is awarded solely on the basis of need.

Allan W. Ostar, the executive director of the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, maintains the Office of Education program has been counterproductive. The program began, like others in the sixties, as a response to unrest in the inner city. But, as others have felt about other programs of the sixties, Mr. Ostar fears a backlash.

"If the Government continues this policy and if tuitions continue to increase," Mr. Ostar says, "I think the consequences are going to be felt in several quarters, such as the state legislatures' willingness to support educational systems not responsive to the needs of middle income families, those paying the taxes."

"Not the least of the consequences will be the antagonism of middle income families, those in the $10,000 to $15,000 group," Mr. Ostar continues. It is not visible in Russell W. McBride, a sales manager for a chemical company in Delaware, whose paycheck (supplemented by his wife's part-time job in a community college) produces $45,000 a year. It makes sense to Mr. McBride to give preference to the poor, but it does not relieve his difficulties: He had hoped his daughter, the oldest of 10, would get at least a loan from Barnard that he could pay off over several years.

"I know that I've got a good salary in the comparative sense and that there are a lot of people worse off than I am," says Mr. McBride, whose paycheck—supplemented by his wife's part-time job at a community college—produces $45,000 a year for his family. "But it's still a great strain."

EFFECTS OF THE PINCH

All but people in very highest income brackets feel a pinch paying for their children's college education. The effect that this is having on college-going is less certain.

It is still true that the more money a young person's family has, the more likely he or she is to be enrolled in college. In 1973, 47 per cent of all high school graduates went immediately from high school to post-secondary education, including technical and occupational schools, two- and four-year colleges. But, according to the United States Bureau of the Census, in 1973 families below the poverty line, with incomes of less than $3,000, had only 12.7 per cent of their 18- to 24-year-old children enrolled full time. For families with incomes between $5,000 and $7,499, the figure is 23.7 per cent. Around the median—families with incomes between $10,000 and $14,999—36.3 per cent of the 18- to 24-year-olds were enrolled; families with incomes of $15,000 and over had 53.7 per cent.

Statistics in education, of course, are as deceptive as statistics in other fields. True, more young people feel a college education is worth less in a country full of underemployed college graduates and more do not go to college immediately after high school.

But in 1968 55 per cent, not 47, of high school graduates went on to college immediately. The American Association of State Colleges and Universities' suggestion earlier this year that the decline in college-going was related to "increased tuition and related student costs" has been supported by the release last month of a national survey by First National City Bank of New York showing that 12 per cent of Americans said that someone in their family was prevented from going to college during the last five or six years by the cost.

What the cost of college seems to influence most is the choice of college. The lower tuitions of tax-supported institutions have great appeal to families unwilling or unable to pay for private colleges. Twenty-five years ago, half of all American college students were in private institutions; the number has now dropped to one-quarter.

REINTRODUCING MERIT

Private colleges, eager to keep their share of the enrollment from falling even further, began to introduce scholarships specifically earmarked for middle income, not poor, families. They have also been reviving scholarships based on merit.

Hofstra University on Long Island, now offers $500 grants for students from middle-income families, and $800 scholarships to freshmen, regardless of income level, who ranked in the upper 20 per cent of their high school classes and had combined Scholastic Aptitude Test scores of at least 1200. Even alumni are getting into the act, the class of '55 has just presented almost $50,000 to Lehigh University in Pennsylvania. The money is to endow scholarships exclusively for middle income students.

In Congress, Representative James G. O'Hara, the Michigan Democrat who is chairman of the House Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education, has championed families not poor enough to qualify for college aid. He has introduced a bill that would remove family assets as a test of financial need and reintroduce the merit system for determining who gets a portion of Federal assistance.

From the look of things, most middle income families are going to need all the help they can get. The Oakland Finance Group of Charlottesville, Va., has prepared projections showing that a family that now has a child entering kindergarten will have to bank $1,231 a year between now and the time the youngster is graduated from high school if the family wants to put away in advance all of the money that will be required for that child's college education at a public university. If the family is thinking about a private college, it should save $2,072 a year.

COPING WITH THE RISING COSTS OF COLLEGE

With reference to your lead editorial of April 8, titled "College Costs," all I can say is bunk!

I can personally assure you that the burden of paying for college is not coming down for me. I am, I suppose, in the "middle middle" income bracket. I earn $26,000 gross per year. Yet the faceless folks at the College Scholarship Service (CSS) say I earn too much for my son to qualify for any—repeat any—assistance. And the way the system is organized, the university won't provide any assistance unless the need is certified by CSS.

Of course, I can handle the problem any number of ways: Put my wife to work, take a second mortgage on the house, or something else. But, the bitter irony is that I could perhaps solve the problem most easily by disowning my son; that is, putting him out of the house on his own. Were I to do this, he would automatically become eligible for all sorts of aids: grants, loans, food stamps, the whole works. I can't bring myself to do that, even though the system seems to encourage it—and many people do.

You are probably correct in saying that there is more aid available to students than ever before, but its not finding its way to us in the middle. And while the real cost of college may not be up (I sincerely believe that point is very arguable), the real cost of practically everything else is thereby increasing the burden of college costs indirectly. It particularly galls me that your writers can't seem to emphasize at all with this middle-class crunch. We are bruised, and we think its about time we got some help, too. Anyone who can't realize that is out of touch with the real world. The least you could do is some investigative reporting with respect to who is and who isn't getting help with the financial burden of college.

As you would expect, we middle-incomers will find some way to get our kids through college, and we'll continue to pay our taxes so that the government (so nobly assisted by the education lobbies) can educate other people's kids at our expense. But I suggest that some day there will be a political reckoning, and it will probably be severe because you molders of public opinion and our elected representatives failed to perceive that the "doers" of this country could never get tired of carrying the load. What happens when that middle income "wealth" is no longer available for redistribution?

COMMERCE COMMITTEE STUDY ON "MOTOR CARRIAGE REGULATORY REVISION"

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would like to direct my colleagues' attention to a report published recently by the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation that represents a major contribution to the current debate surrounding the need for regulatory reform in the trucking industry. The report, entitled "The Impact on Small Communities of Motor Carriage Regulatory Revision", is the result of the committee's decision to commission, during the first session of the 95th Congress, Policy and Management Associates, Inc., of Boston, Mass., to conduct an independent study of the impact regulatory reform could be expected to have on motor carrier service to small communities.

The Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly, which has recently completed its 10th day of hearings on pricing practices in the trucking industry, will surely benefit from the information and insights contained in the report as we continue to evaluate the anticompetitive effects and ostensible benefits to the public of the broad antitrust immunity trucking companies now enjoy to discuss and set prices collectively. I applaud the Commerce Committee, and particularly Senators CANNON and MAGNUSON, for their continuing attention to the problems of the Nation's surface transportation system and for their foresight in commissioning this study.

The report addresses one of the most fundamental issues in the current debate over regulatory reform in the trucking industry: Whether a relaxation of strict Federal regulation would cause current levels of service to small communities to diminish. In its examination of this issue, the report calls into question a number of traditional rationales for the present regulatory scheme. It concludes that regulatory reform would have salutary effects on the structure and performance of the industry, and many benefits for its users.

The report counters the contention that less economic regulation of this industry would cause a sudden loss of service to small towns. It indicates, instead, that the effects of reform would be positive with gradual, beneficial changes affecting large and small towns alike. These positive effects, the study concludes, would include a decline in general rate levels and an increase in the variety of price and service options available to shippers. The study also anticipates the opportunity for trucking companies to enhance their profitability through greater efficiency.

In its current oversight investigation of truck regulation, the Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly is seeking to determine whether there is adequate price competition in the industry, and whether collective ratemaking operates in the interest of shippers, consumers, and workers, as well as the trucking companies themselves. Shippers, including manufacturers in small communities, have impressed upon the subcommittee their desire for more flexible rates and services than they now receive, and their interest in being able to negotiate comprehensive shipping plans tailored to their individual business needs. One of the report's most significant findings is that an extremely broad range of rate and service preferences were expressed by the shippers surveyed. A significant percentage of the shippers expressed their desire for the option to pay more for more elaborate service and less for a considerably lower level of service.

Evidence developed in the course of the Antitrust Subcommittee's investigation thus far lends support to these findings. Our inquiry has revealed that Federal regulation of the trucking industry curtails price competition and may foster excessive service competition among firms. Shipper dissatisfaction with regulated rates and service has manifested itself in the startling growth in the number of private truck fleets now in operation. This has not come without significant detrimental impact on the financial position of many regulated carriers and their employees.

The Commerce Committee report is a thorough, timely, and sophisticated contribution to our knowledge of an industry central to this Nation's growth. The report will undoubtedly inspire and stimulate additional independent analyses of other facets of economic regulation of the motor carrier industry and of the too-long-untested assumptions which undergird it. Only through utilization of analyses such as this can Congress make informed decisions about any reforms that may be necessary.

I commend "The Impact on Small Communities of Motor Carriage Regulatory Revision" to the reading of Members of Congress and their staffs.●

A BUSINESSMAN LOOKS AT SOVIET-AMERICAN TRADE

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, there has been a great deal of discussion in the Congress and in the press for several months now about whether or not the United States should curtail its trade with the Soviet Union in retaliation for Soviet activities which we find offensive, notably the suppression of human rights exemplified by the Shcharansky and Ginsburg trials. It is a natural temptation to retaliate when confronted with offensive behavior. And many, perhaps even the majority of those who have joined in this debate, urge that we cut down our contacts with the U.S.S.R. to show our displeasure with Soviet attitudes and actions.

There are others, however, who caution moderation; who believe that more can be accomplished by leverage than by linkage; who suggest that history teaches that criticism from abroad tends to solidify the Soviet people behind their government rather than to raise questions about whether or not the government is pursuing wise policies.

This debate is not new. Only the ammunition that is fueling it now is new. And perhaps the issues will never be satisfactorily resolved. But one point of view that has received little exposure in the debate and which deserves particular attention is that of American business, especially those businesses that have had reasonably long experience in trade with the Soviet Union.

Donald M. Kendall, chairman of the board and chief executive officer of Pepsico, Inc., represents this point of view ably and responsibly. He is under no illusions that "trade is a panacea for all our problems dealing with the Russians." But he argues persuasively that "expansion of our economic relations provides one of the most effective means of minimizing unnecessary stress in our overall relations and thus enhances the prospects of world peace."

Not long ago Mr. Kendall spoke on the subject of Soviet-American Trade at a meeting of the Boston World Affairs Council. I ask that his talk be printed in the RECORD.

The address follows:

SOVIET-AMERICAN TRADE

More than likely, some of you already know me as an outspoken proponent of U.S.-Soviet trade. Since I am addressing such a distinguished group, I would not only like to share my views with you, but also, I am interested in knowing your opinions. Therefore, I intend to allow plenty of time for comments and questions at the conclusion of my remarks.

What I propose to do this morning is concentrate on some of the misconceptions about Soviet-American trade. In my opinion, these misconceptions distort U.S. thinking with respect to the Soviet Union and serve as stumbling blocks to formulation of a sound U.S. foreign policy vis-a-vis Russia.

Let me ask, how many of you would like to see the U.S. and the Soviet Union increase trade with each other?

About a year ago, Lou Harris took a nationwide poll, asking this same question. A two-thirds majority indicated that they would like to see Russia and the U.S. increase trade with each other, and 75% were in favor of detente.

However, even though a 61% majority of the American public voiced the opinion that they would like to see Russia given the same trading rights with the United States as most other nations have, Congress has failed to grant the Soviets these rights. What is in question here is called "most favored nation status."

Unfortunately, the term "most favored nation" is misleading in of itself. These words imply preferential treatment, when in actuality, MFN, as it is commonly referred to, represents the standard trading rights granted by the U.S. to the vast majority of countries in the world. In fact, the Soviet Union had enjoyed MFN up until 1951 when the U.S. withdrew it at the height of the Cold War.

In terms of dollars and cents, the lack of most favored nation status for the U.S.S.R. increases the duties on goods from that country anywhere from 23% on machine tools, for example; 34% on binoculars; 63% on watches; and 78% on distilled alcoholic beverages. From these examples, you can rapidly deduce what lack of MFN does to the potential for trade.

Most of you are familiar with what happened in 1974 when Congress modified the terms of the proposed Trade Reform Act with passage of the Jackson-Vanik Amendment. This amendment legislated that Moscow must issue explicit declarations about free emigration in order to secure most favored nation status. The Russians flatly rejected this arrangement.

This discussion brings me to my next point: the whole concept of linkage. Let's stop for a minute and picture what Congress was asking Moscow to do by publicly linking most favored nation status with free emigration. As my friend Tom Clausen of Bank of America remarked, ". . . It would be like an order from an Arab country to the U.S. saying 'no more oil unless you have school busing.'"

The Soviets are a very proud people, as we ourselves are, and they are extremely concerned about their image around the world. Hedrick Smith, who was Moscow Bureau Chief for the New York Times from 1971–74. observed in his book that the Russians may criticize the system among themselves, some may even do this in front of foreigners, but if a foreigner dare offer the same criticism, the Russian will switch in mid-stream and defend the Soviet system.

The Jackson-Vanik Amendment constituted a public threat from the U.S., and the Soviets were not about to give in to this condition as a matter of principle. As a result of the amendment, not only did we lose out on the potential from increased trade between our two countries, which so many Americans favor, but we managed to further aggravate the situation on emigration. In 1973, Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union totaled 34,000, and in 1975, following the Trade Reform Act fiasco, the number dropped to 14,000.

Advances in trade and economic cooperation should not be held hostage to equal advances in the human rights area. By publicly linking internal reform, or any kind of action by the Soviets, to something they want from us, we are, in effect, sabotaging our own efforts.

As Marshall Shulman, currently State Department Adviser on Soviet policy, remarked: "Easing of repression [in the Soviet Union] is more likely to result from evolutionary forces within the society under prolonged conditions of reduced international tension than from external demand for change and the siege mentality they would reinforce."

It is my firm conviction that progress in one area, for instance trade, will significantly improve the overall climate so that the chances for progress in other areas will have a better chance of occurring.

In fact, the Soviet Minister of Foreign Trade Patolichev shares this philosophy with Shulman and myself. At the most recent annual meeting of the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Trade and Economic Council, Minister Patolichev put it this way: "Trade questions are the most simple and easiest to resolve. Trade helps create an atmosphere of trust and it helps solve other issues."

Certain critics of Soviet-American trade perceive this relationship as a one-way street, with Russia acquiring the grain and technology they need and the U.S. receiving nothing in return. I would hazard a guess that if this were the case, trade between our two countries would come to a dead stop even if all restrictions were lifted. Let's take a closer look at "what's in it for us."

First of all, we have a lot to gain in terms of raw materials. As the largest country in the world, the Soviet Union possesses natural resources that are generally larger and more varied than any other country's, including our own. Let's start with energy, for instance—a commodity which is becoming increasingly precious to all of us. The Soviet Union is the world's largest producer of petroleum, and 35 percent of the world's known gas reserves are located in the U.S.S.R. Another example is metals, such as chrome, platinum, palladium, and rhodium.

Thus, as we look around us to discover that our supplies of raw materials are no longer as abundant as they use to be, we realize that we need the Russians' raw materials, just as they need our technology to exploit some of their untapped resources.

Furthermore, we should do everything possible to keep the Russians in the position of being a net exporter of oil and gas, because the more oil and gas on the world market, the greater the likelihood of stable supply and prices.

Secondly, let's examine how our commercial transactions with Russia affect our balance of trade, which is an issue of great concern to us in view of the weakening dollar. From 1971 to 1976, the U.S. experienced a $2.5 billion favorable trade balance with the U.S.S.R. and a $3.0 billion surplus for all of Eastern Europe. Last year, the total volume of trade between the U.S. and the Soviet Union fell over 25 percent yet two-way trade between the Communist countries and ourselves reached some $3.7 billion, about $2.6 billion of which represented U.S. exports, resulting in a healthy surplus for the United States.

Thirdly, what kind of an impact does Soviet-American trade have on U.S. employment? Our Commerce Department conservatively estimates that $25,000 in manufactured exports provides one job. In 1976, non-agricultural exports to the Soviet Union provided over 30,000 jobs.

Lastly, in terms of benefits to Americans, and to my mind most important, increased trade between our two countries enhances the possibility of an improved political climate. As trade relations develop, person-to-person contacts build mutual understanding. The more they know us and the more we know them, the better. As the Soviet economy becomes more interconnected with the world's economy, its stake in a stable, international economic order is heightened. At the same time, it becomes increasingly difficult for its government to withdraw to an isolationist and belligerent status, thereby bettering the odds for world peace.

Now that I have outlined some of the benefits of Soviet-American trade, both economic and political, some of you may be saying to yourselves, do the advantages outweigh the risks? Let's examine some of these so-called risks.

Is there any danger of our becoming too dependent on Russian imports? When you consider that East-West trade currently represents about 1% of total U.S. trade, you realize that increasing imports from the Soviet Union can only serve to diversify our sources of supply.

Are the Russians a bad credit risk? The answer is no—they have the ability to pay, and for the most part, their repayment record has been very good. Soviet debt is estimated to be between $14 and $15 billion. To place this figure in perspective, look at this debt within the context of the Russian GNP: total hard currency credits represent slightly more than 1% of the Soviet economy's total output. Specialists estimate the Soviets have reserves of about 2,000 tons of gold, which along with their petroleum and natural gas reserves, supply the country with the wherewithal to improve its trade balance situation and service its past debt.

Furthermore, the U.S. is hardly a significant contributor to the Soviet debt. Credits extended to Russia by the Export-Import Bank total $469 million, a mere 3% of their total debt.

Another issue of concern to many is the whole area of technology: by selling its technology to the Soviet Union, is the U.S. aiding the Russians to its own detriment? The fact is, the U.S. does not possess a monopoly on technology. Did you know, for instance, that the gasoline and diesel engine were invented in Germany? The steam locomotive, the jet engine and the Bessemer process for processing steel were all inventions from England.

And the list goes on. Most of the technology which the Soviets need and cannot obtain directly from us, can be purchased from the Japanese, the Germans, or the Italians.

We already have a system by which the U.S. protects itself against the transfer of important military technology. Each application for an export license is screened by the Federal government before it is issued, and any export that could conceivably make a contribution towards the military potential of a Communist country is barred.

Recently, considerable alarm has been sounded with regard to the Soviet Union's increasing military strength. For the first time in its history, Russia is capable of projecting its power far beyond its shores. Some critics of Soviet-American trade maintain that there is a link between the inception of détente in 1972 and the military buildup in Russia. In actuality, much of what the Soviets are demonstrating today in the line of military equipment is the result of decisions made in the early and middle 60's. Military experts say that since the Cuban missile crisis, the Soviet Union has been adding to its defense budget at a steady rate of 3-5 percent a year.

I believe that history provides enough evidence to convince us that the Soviet Union will meet its strategic military plans whether or not we trade with them. Obviously, our past restrictive policies have not held back the Russians. As Henry Kissinger observed during his tenure as Secretary of State: "What is new today is the culmination of thirty years of postwar growth of Soviet industrial, technological, and military power. No American policy caused this: no American policy could have prevented it. . . ."

I do not pretend to believe that trade is the panacea for all of our problems in dealing with the Russians. When two giants, such as the United States and the Soviet Union, have such radically conflicting ideologies, there will always be a degree of tension in their relations. Trade is never going to eliminate that clashing of political thought, as it manifests itself in each country's foreign policy.

However, I wholeheartedly believe that expansion of our economic relations provides one of the most effective means of minimizing the unnecessary stress in our overall relations and thus enhances the prospects of world peace.●

ADDRESS BY MR. KENNEDY TO THE U.S. CONFERENCE OF MAYORS

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, my distinguished colleague, Senator KENNEDY, recently addressed the annual meeting of the U.S. Conference of Mayors in Atlanta.

Speaking of the challenges now facing the mayors of this country in a city that I feel is one of the brightest stars on our urban horizon, Senator KENNEDY spoke thoughtfully and hopefully of what a national commitment to the health of our cities can mean:

We can rally the people to our standard. We can stretch our resources to meet the need. We can build a new framework of partnership and cooperation. We can alleviate the suffering of those in need, and bring sunlight to their shadows. In so many different ways, we can create a brighter future for our cities.

Mr. President, I commend the full text of Senator KENNEDY's remarks to the Conference of Mayors to the attention of my distinguished colleagues in the Senate, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR EDWARD M. KENNEDY

President Alexander, Maynard Jackson of Atlanta, Kevin White of Boston, friends and mayors. It is a pleasure for me to be with you this afternoon on the first day of the 46th Annual Meeting of the Conference of Mayors.

I want to express my appreciation for the kind and thoughtful words of introduction by your President, Lee Alexander of Syracuse, who has been such an outstanding leader of the Conference. And I also congratulate your incoming President, William McNichols of Denver, who will carry on the cities' work and the vital interests that the Conference of Mayors serves so well. I also commend John Gunther and the other members of your Washington staff who have provided wise counsel and assistance to all of us in Congress on a broad range of issues important to the cities.

There is another individual, whose memory permeates this hall, whose vigor renews our spirit and whose life was a living tribute to the vitality of our cities. When Hubert Humphrey last spoke to you, he said:

"We have to think of the grand design of the America we want. We have to be willing to think big and to plan big. We have to tell the American people that this is a big country for a great people. We have got to start to build this country the way it ought to be."

His vision of America was your vision, too. For nearly half a century, the Conference of Mayors has been fighting the cities' battles. Wisely you have understood that what happens in other vital areas of foreign and domestic policy is also vital for the future of the cities. Your voices were among the clearest and most eloquent in helping the nation understand that the Vietnam war was wrong. And today you are an equally influential voice for an effective SALT agreement, because you understand the importance of nuclear arms control to the peace of the world and the future of our country and its cities.

The challenges the cities face at home have never been easy ones to meet, at any period in our history. But your burdens have grown enormously in recent years. There are six hundred cities represented in the United States Conference of Mayors. And I want to tell you that in my book, you have the six hundred toughest jobs in the United States of America.

Never has there been a greater gulf between the problems of the cities and the comforts of the suburbs.

As the gap grows wider, the cities have been left with fewer resources to solve their problems. They are losing the resources of people, because as suburbs grow, the cities have declined in population. They are losing the resource of dollars, because as industry moves out, the property base dries up and revenues decline. And a whole generation of children is growing up who believe the central business district is the little sign beside the highway, pointing in a direction they never go.

All these enormous challenges and many others have landed in your laps. In fact, in America in 1978, it takes a contortionist to be a mayor. If you're doing your job correctly, you've got one hand pulling back on the reins of business heading for the suburbs. The other hand is filling out the paperwork for grants from Washington. The local newspaper has locked its teeth into one of your legs. Your other leg is in the bear pit of a contract dispute whose deadline expired last night. You're on the telephone with an SOS to the governor. You've got one eye on your opponent in the next election, and now your other eye is riveted on Howard Jarvis.

Like the farmers at Concord Bridge two hundred years ago, the embattled taxpayers of California have fired a shot heard 'round the world. No person in public life—no President, no Senator, no Governor, no Mayor—can ignore the message and the outraged feelings of the people. Our job is to understand the meaning of Proposition 13 and to carry out its mandate wisely—so that it becomes an effective warning shot across the bow of government, and not a shot below the waterline of the American ship of state.

If we are going to bring relief to the hard-pressed taxpayers of this nation, let us do so in ways that do not destroy local tax systems that are the cornerstone of local control over local services in our federal nation, that do not drive mayors hat in hand to Sacramento or Washington to find refuge from angry voters and that do not turn tax teller for deserving homeowners into tax windfalls for the property of big business.

If we are going to stop the hemorrhage of revenues wasted in massive spending designed to help the many who are poor, let us do so in ways that also stop the hemorrhage of revenues wasted in massive spending through tax loopholes designed to help the few who are rich. If we are going to provide tax relief from the burden of soaring tuition costs, let us do so in ways that do not undermine the cities' public schools.

Above all, if we are going to balance the federal budget, let us resolve that the burden will be shared by all—not just the cities, not just the poor and the black and the sick—so that no citizen pays too high a price for the cutbacks the future may have in store.

General Eisenhower once complained to Marshal Zhukov about the delays and difficulties involved in clearing minefields, so that allied troops could advance. Zhukov replied that he solved the problem easily—by ordering his troops to march across the field. If Proposition 13 brings us to ground like that, no one, least of all urban America, should have to do the marching.

It may well be that we have poured too little brains into programs to rescue those in need. But it is not because we have poured in too much heart. As the poet Dante wrote, Divine justice weighs the sins of the cold-blooded and the sins of the warm hearted in different scales—the hottest places in hell are reserved for those who, in times of great moral crisis, maintain their neutrality. For America, in 1978, the great moral crisis is the challenge of the cities.

It isn't fair to blame our problems on the cities or their mayors.

It wasn't the mayors who let the national economy capsize twice because of recessions in the past ten years, or who caused our serious problems of inflation and unemployment.

It wasn't the mayors who started a trust fund for superhighways at the expense of city transportation.

It wasn't the mayors who created a welfare system that encourages people not to work or that drives families apart.

It wasn't the mayors who devised a tax policy that gives federal subsidies for companies to desert their city homes and build in the suburbs.

In other areas, like crime and energy, health and education, housing and environment, there are similar problems that afflict our society at large, but come home to roost in a special way in the cities of the nation.

It wasn't the mayors who caused these problems. In large part, the blame falls squarely on the short-sighted policies of the Federal government. Now is the time that our federal policies have to change, and start paying more attention to the cities.

A stronger and more vital urban program is not a narrow-minded policy designed at the expense of other sections of the nation. Those who live in the suburbs and the rural areas are beginning to understand that a victory for the cities is a victory for them as well. For it is their fight too. Without success for the cities of America, there can be no real success for the farms or suburbs either.

I urge all of you, in a special plea today, to give President Carter a chance. Give Vice President Mondale a chance. Give Secretary Harris and H.U.D. a chance.

At last, we have an administration that is trying to understand the cities and is worried about their problems. Ed Koch knows better than most—the mayors are acquiring new partners in Congress and the White House.

We can differ about the elements of the President's urban policy announced last March. We can debate the specifics of the programs and question the levels of funding. But the direct involvement of the President was a significant accomplishment and an important beginning of a new day for America's cities. The concerns of urban America have been elevated to a higher place on the national agenda. It is up to Congress to respond to the initiative, and it is up to you and others who care about these matters to help refine it and see that it is enacted into law before Congress adjourns for the fall elections.

Although things are not what we would like them to be in urban America, the situation is getting better. People are putting aside their differences and working creatively with what they have. At each level of government the public and private sectors, labor and neighborhood groups are beginning to work more effectively together. As I have heard Coleman Young say so many times, "We can see around the corner."

Cities are reclaiming older and declining areas. Abandoned lands have been turned into new and attractive neighborhoods. Mills and factories have been converted into housing for the elderly.

In our own city of Boston, the Quincy Market has become a crowded tourist attraction and a thriving commercial center, a magnet drawing throngs of shoppers from the suburbs.

In New Orleans, the Superdome, the largest facility of its kind in the world, was built on a decaying downtown street and has already generated half a billion dollars in private development in the central business district.

In San Antonio, the riverwalk built along the river draws tens of thousands to the center of the city to enjoy its restaurants and shops and the shade of its lovely trees.

And in Portland, department stores are deciding to remain downtown and new stores are going up because of the outstanding transit mall, historic districts, and the green park leading to the river.

In individual ways like these and many others, we can rejuvenate our cities. Dedicated mayors and concerned communities have begun to make a difference and to make their cities work.

It is a national responsibility to work with mayors who are facing the issues and seizing the opportunities. And there are important procedural reforms that we must adopt if we are to reach our goals.

In accord with the rising costs and frustration of the taxpayers who pay the bills, we must develop more effective ways to cut the fraud and fat and waste from needed federal, state and local programs. None of us will find it easy to perform the surgery required. But then operation must be carried out if we are to restore the confidence of the people in the way government carries out its public trust. If we are not willing to cut the fat, then others who care less about these urgent problems may rush in to cut the muscle, too.

We must do a better job of targeting our limited public resources in accord with the real priorities of the nation. There is an elementary principle of government that has been lost too often in the pork barrel politics of the past and present—the principle that the people and the places with the greatest need are the ones that deserve the greatest help. One of the greatest inequalities is to insist on equal treatment for places with unequal needs. It makes no sense, in the name of false equality, to insist that scarce dollars designed for urban needs must be spread around for the benefit of others not in need. So long as we merely spread our strength evenly across the land, we do not solve our problems—we merely waste our dollars.

If eligibility for assistance is too inclusive, we will give funds to some to spend on marginal services, while others must forego vital services. If we spend a dollar in a place which does not need it, it is not merely a gift, but a deprivation, and only insures that misery elsewhere shall persist.

The ink was barely dry on the President's urban message before special interest groups began their drive to blur its focus and destroy its targeted approach. Those who care about the cities must do battle so that the proposed National Development Bank's assistance will be directed to the needy, not the greedy.

Slow population growth and slow employment growth do not necessarily mean economic distress. By themselves, they should not entitle communities to aid from the National Development Bank. Private investors are not discriminating against wealthy suburbs. It is unconscionable for them to demand that any aid designed to help the central cities must be broad enough to cover them as well.

Finally, just as we need a wiser allocation of resources, we also need a wiser distribution of responsibility, by giving more responsibility to those who are able to do the job.

One of the most significant new initiatives by the Federal government in recent years is the effort to give greater breathing room to competition in our free enterprise system by reducing the burden of federal regulation on the private sector of our economy. We must do the same for the public sector. The time has come for the Federal government to give greater breathing room to the mayors, and let them do their jobs.

If we can deregulate the airlines, so that they can serve their passengers, if we can deregulate other areas of the economy, then we can also deregulate the mayors so that they can serve the people of our cities.

Excessive federal regulation is reducing the potential for urban growth. We have tried to insure against every possible error, thereby preventing mayors from being bold. We have slowed down federal processing of grants to insure against misspent dollars, thereby forcing mayors to forego opportunity.

The federal government has not adequately considered the consequences of adding a new procedural requirement or substantive limitation each time a problem presents itself. If one city takes a drink, we have put every city on the wagon, regardless of the extra paperwork, or the different circumstances of different cities.

We can no longer afford to take months to process ninety-nine good applications to insure that we do not fund a bad one. We can no longer afford to make ninety-nine cities turn square corners for fear that one city will cut a corner.

We must change the way we disburse the funds. The Federal government must satisfy with setting goals and assessing results instead of imposing burdensome requirements that jeopardize the goals. If the problems are national and deserve federal support, we must assure that steps are taken to correct them. But the conditions in this land are too varied, the diversity too great, and the creativity too widespread for the federal government to dictate the detailed ways in which the problems shall be met.

We can do more to coordinate the scores of federal departments and agencies which carry out our urban programs. We need a single task force to unify the applications and procedures of all urban agencies. We need better methods for approval of frequently recurring types of jointly funded projects. It should not take longer to build a civic center than it did to win World War II.

It is not the role of Congress or H.U.D. to take over City Hall or stifle the initiative of local leaders elected by the people. The mayors of America deserve a better fate than being treated like Gulliver, bound tightly by federal strings, encircled by Lilliputian Federal bureaucrats.

No one should believe these changes will will make life easier for you. The price of greater freedom is greater responsibility. Citizens who pay the public bills are no longer willing to tolerate the misuse and waste of their hard-earned dollars. If there are fewer rules to restrict you, you will have fewer excuses to explain away your failures. If the bucks are going to go to the mayors, the buck must stop with the mayors. Most mayors will want to take this offer—our programs will be more effective for it and our cities will be better places.

These, then, are the twin pillars of a national urban policy—adequate resources targeted to meet the local need, and effective responsibility allocated to local officials who can do the job.

The task ahead of us is not an easy one. It has become harder now than it was last year, or even two weeks ago.

But we can resolve today to summon the greater effort required to meet the larger challenge.

We can rally the people to our standard. We can stretch our resources to meet the need. We can build a new framework of partnership and cooperation. We can alleviate the suffering of those in need, and bring sunlight to their shadows. In so many different ways, we can create a brighter future for our cities. Success will require strength and courage, insight and understanding, sacrifice and perseverance. Above all, it will require a new and deeper commitment from all who share America's urban dream.

Daniel Webster of Massachusetts put it well 150 years ago, when he said, recalling the events of the revolution:

"Let us develop the resources of our land, call forth its powers, build up its institutions, promote all its greatest interests, and see whether we may also. in our day and generation, perform something worthy to be remembered."

The challenge summons us across the years. May each of us, to the best of our ability, in our own day and generation, perform something worthy to be remembered.●

ADDRESS BY SENATOR DOLE TO THE NATIONAL CORN GROWERS ASSOCIATION

● Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, on July 17, 1978, our distinguished colleague, Senator BOB DOLE of Kansas, gave a speech at Lincoln, Nebr., to the National Corn Growers Association. Senator DOLE dwelt on some very important matters of concern, not only to corn farmers, but to all American agriculture.

Senator DOLE is one of the best friends that American agriculture has.

Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD Senator DOLE's address:

REMARKS OF SENATOR BOB DOLE

I am deeply honored to be here this morning to address the annual meeting of the National Corn Growers Association. It is always a pleasure to be in Nebraska, a great agricultural state, and to speak to such a dedicated group of American farmers.

You and I share common beliefs, goals, and dreams!

We both want to strengthen American agriculture.

We both want to increase the income flowing to our farmers.

We both want the farmer to receive a fair wage and a fair return on his investment.

We both seek to provide new opportunities for young people to enter farming.

We both are dedicated to the family farm as the backbone of our agricultural production system.

We both want the farmer to be free to produce in a free market.

We both seek to keep the involvement of government in agricultural decisions to a minimum.

We both seek to maintain a healthy agriculture—one that is economically efficient and productive and free from unnecessary regulations.

Those of us in Congress, and especially those of us in leadership positions on the Agriculture Committee, have the responsibility for developing legislation to achieve these positive and necessary goals.

Farmers have to be free to make a profit. They have to be free to operate and make decisions based on the information provided by our economic system concerning supply and demand and prices.

They should not have to produce in an uncertain climate of government regulation, arbitrary decisions by government officials, and ever changing government farm programs. Government programs and actions have been like a roller-coaster. Up and down, on and off.

The farming system is uncertain enough because of weather, world demand, changing consumer needs and other forces without adding an uncertain, ever changing, unpredictable, intervening government.

The government's economic and spending policies seem to be causing the major problems facing farmers.

INFLATION HOAX

I believe this Administration is developing a strategy to blame inflation on the American farmer and drive a wedge between the farmer and the consumer.

This Administration is perpetrating a hoax on the American farmer and the American consumer.

The farmers problems with getting responsive legislation, getting rid of excessive government regulations, obtaining adequate agricultural credit, stopping the purchase of farmland by foreigners, having a healthy livestock market, and obtaining a fair ratio between prices paid and prices received all relate to the government's inability and lack of will power to stop inflation once and for all.

The Administration's main battleground in their so-called fight against inflation, their hoax on the American farmer, is holding down agricultural product prices.

They seem to be fighting inflation by keeping down the price of corn, sugar, cattle, wheat, and other agricultural products.

Their justification for this action is to lower consumer prices and thereby fight inflation.

Inflation is killing our farmers financially. They cannot stand double-digit inflation for what they buy when the price of what they sell stays at low levels.

The farmer has not been the cause of inflation—he has been the victim of inflation. President Carter seems to believe just the opposite.

If we would require our governments to live within their means, the inflationary spiral would not only be controlled—it would stop.

DOLE TAX PROPOSALS

I have proposed measures to provide tax relief and curbs on government spending to aid American taxpayers.

The four initiatives are:

(1) An income exclusion of increased wages earned as a result of our spiraling inflation.

(2) A constitutional amendment calling for a federally balanced budget.

(3) A Congressional Commission to study and recommend a proposal for limited federal spending.

(4) An amendment to the Budget Act requiring that the budget resolution contain no real increases in spending.

In addition, I am calling for the States to petition Congress for a constitutional convention to consider a constitutional amendment for a balanced federal budget.

FARMERS FACE FINANCIAL DISASTER

I need not go into detail about the serious economic state that most of the farmers are still facing today. All of you are personally aware of the situation. During 1977, farm indebtedness reached an astronomical $102 billion as farmers geared up to meet world food needs.

During this time new farm income dropped to disastrously low levels—last year—to about $20 billion. This was $13 billion below the 1973 record year.

Because of this, many farmers are having trouble meeting their obligations. In my state of Kansas, many farmers—particularly young farmers—have come face-to-face with bankruptcy.

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT LEGISLATION

An area of concern to farmers is the adequacy of the existing agriculture credit system, which has been put to the test by the economic and natural adversities encountered by farmers in most areas of the country.

The loan limits of the Farmers Home Administration have been outdated for the farmers of Kansas for several years. The FmHA has just not had the necessary tools to properly serve family farmers, at least in my state of Kansas.

A Senate-House Conference Committee has approved a bill, which I originally introduced in the Senate, to expand and modernize the farm credit programs of the FmHA.

This legislation is designed to bring the Farmers Home Administration Programs into touch with the times so that they will be more responsive to today's farm credit needs.

The Farm Credit Bill is the most significant and far-reaching farm credit legislation to come before the Congress for several years. I am confident it will be approved this week by the Congress and signed by the President before the end of July.

CREDIT LEGISLATION PROVISIONS

The Conference Bill includes provisions which would:

(1) Raise the FmHA real estate loan ceiling from $100,000 to $200,000 on direct loans and to $300,000 on federally-guaranteed loans.

(2) Raise the FmHA farm operating loan ceiling from $50,000 to $100,000 on direct loans and to $200,000 on federally-guaranteed loans.

(3) Make family-farm corporations, partnerships, and cooperatives eligible for FmHA credit for the first time.

(4) Authorize cattlemen to approve a beef promotion checkoff program by a simple majority of producers voting in a referendum. This was an amendment I offered.

In 1976, we were successful in passing the Beef Research and Information Act, which provides for a referendum to be conducted by the cattlemen. A nationwide check-off program would be established to create a beef board financed with the funds collected.

The Beef Board would develop research and carry out programs of market development at home and abroad. Any cattleman not wishing to participate would be able to freely request a refund of deducted check-off funds.

Such a referendum was conducted in the summer of 1977. The referendum was approved by 56.7% of the cattlemen voting, but the law required approval by two-thirds of those voting.

An amendment I proposed to the Farm Credit Legislation was adopted by the Senate and accepted by the House conferees. The amendment lowered the required approval to a majority of those cattlemen voting.

We are hopeful that now another referendum can be conducted and be readily approved. Approval of this referendum and the resulting research and market development could provide a tremendous stimulus to beef and corn farmers.

(5) Extend a special cattle industry credit program for one year, through September 30, 1979.

(6) Authorize an economic emergency loan program for farmers who have suffered losses due to low farm prices. The loan total would be limited to $400,000 per farmer and loans could be used to refinance debts and to pay for operating expenses.

(7) Create a special farm real estate loan for beginning and low-income farmers with interest rates set at five percent or less. A reduced principal payment schedule could apply during the early years of each loan to allow the new farm family to get on its feet.

Increased credit is by no means the cure-all for the farmer's problems. We must continue efforts to increase farm income. This bill will provide farmers with a more realistic, more flexible, and broader agricultural credit program than has been available.

COST OF GOVERNMENT REGULATIONS

There are many areas of vital concern to American agriculture and to farm families. One of these, I know from the letters farmers have been writing me, is the overregulation of farming and business by government.

The projected estimate of the cost of government regulation of farming, business, and industry for fiscal 1979 is $134.8 billion. This sum is appalling to me and I believe should be drastically reduced.

The government's fiscal 1979 regulatory budget is up 6% from $4.54 billion in the current fiscal year, and up a staggering 115% from $2.24 billion in 1974.

I believe Congress is going to have to take a closer look at the regulatory agencies and their enabling legislation. Some of this legislation needs to be amended. OSHA, EPA, and other agencies are a thorn in the flesh to farmers, and businessmen. Many of their regulations are absurd and don't even make common sense. The agencies are the subject of many jokes.

The rapid growth in federal regulatory spending is greater than the growth in the federal budget, the population of the country, the gross national product, or any of the other normal yardsticks used for comparison.

I am concerned about the cost of government regulation because it normally translates into higher prices for consumers, lower efficiency for workers, farmers, businessmen and helps create overall economic stagnation, in short—inflation!

I am working to see what amendments should be enacted to change present regulatory legislation. I am also working to limit the funding for the agencies that seem to forget common sense when they write their rules and regulations.

MEAT IMPORTS

Another area of concern to American agriculture and to farm families especially to corn growers is the economic health of the livestock industry.

The economic health of the corn industry is tied closely to the economic health of the livestock industry. With over one-half of your corn crop going to feed cattle, hogs, and chickens you have a vital stake in the health of these industries.

You need a strong demand for meat products in order to have a strong demand for corn. It is essential for the corn grower that the livestock industry be strong and healthy.

I believe part of the present low price/crop surplus situation for corn is the result of a depressed cattle market the last several years which has resulted in reduced cattle numbers.

We are not going to get the feedgrain industry on a strong profitable level until we have a healthy meat industry and until we expand our exports. To expand production a cattleman has to see prospects of a profit for three years.

The unfortunate decision by President Carter to interfere in the cattle industry by raising beef imports will in the long-run have a negative effect on the corn growers.

I am not quite certain what spurred the President to increase import quotas. The record will show the only impact of the President's action will be to damage further the American farmer.

This is not a partisan concern. Senators, Congressmen, farmers and business leaders from both parties have joined me protesting this unfortunate action by the President.

This is a concern about cattle and corn producers and their families who are trying to make a living.

I do not know how we can expect the American cattleman to continue to produce or to expand his production as long as they are forced to accept this type of action from any Administration.

Everytime the farmer starts to make a profit, the government interfers. We talk about the free enterprise system . . .

We talk about letting farmers make it on their own . . .

We talk about getting the government out of agriculture . . .

We talk about an adequate supply of meat at reasonable prices . . .

We talk about letting the farmer get his income from the marketplace . . . and then when the cattle producers, for the first time in a number of years, start to make a profit, the government increases meat imports.

CORN SWEETNERS

Perhaps all corn farmers may not fully appreciate the stake you have in some legislative issues, such as the continuing struggle over sugar price supports. Yet, a substantial share of your market, and the prices you get for all your corn, are directly involved.

You need all the cash markets you can get, at home or abroad. Corn sweetners are gaining increasing acceptance in the food and beverage industry.

Already about ten percent of your cash corn crop goes to the corn refineries, primarily to produce sweetners. Gains or losses in that market affect the price of all your corn.

U.S.D.A. economists estimate that for every 100 million bushels of add disappearance or use, the value of the corn crop goes up 7 cents per bushel.

With about 400 million bushels going into the refineries this marketing year, that meant from 25 cents to 30 cents per bushel in added corn crop value.

To put it into proper perspective, this is about the same amount as the Soviet corn purchases from the United States, and you know what that has meant pricewise.

CORN GROWERS SHOULD BE CONCERNED

Corn Growers should be concerned, particularly when the Administration persists in trying to push through sugar policies deliberately intended to discriminate against corn.

SUGAR PROGRAM COSTS CORN GROWERS

The sugar program of the Carter Administration has cost the American corn grower about $160 million during the past several months.

In the current marketing year corn prices could have been about 4 cents a bushel higher if the Carter Administration had not mishandled the sugar program.

The record sugar imports in 1977 prevented the use of about 60 million bushels of corn at refineries. A million tons of imported sugar was used instead. The cash income of corn growers was reduced by about $160 million.

The Administration seems to either forget you corn producers are involved, or don't care as much about you as they do industrial users of sugar.

The Administration consistently subsidizes them by allowing a huge flood of imported sugar selling below the cost of production—at your expense. as well as the expense of your fellow U.S. farmers producing sugar beets and sugar cane.

INTENT OF CONGRESS IGNORED

The Administration has ignored the clear intent of Congress. Rather than imposing import fees, the administration made payment of about $200 million. Rather than collecting hundreds of millions in import fees and preserving the economic relationships of corn with beets and cane, the administration persisted in these payments—with devastating effects on the budget deficit.

It was because of these defiant actions that the corn industry very rightly called on the federal courts to compel implementation of the law as Congress intended. Many of us in the Congress joined in that effort, filing support briefs with the court.

Every move the administration has to take on sugar is directly opposed to the interests of corn growers—including its recommendations for new legislation again seeking payments to cane and beet processors contrary to the expressed will of Congress.

The Congress must re-establish its authority, and insist that its legislative intent is implemented. We need and welcome your support in doing so. The National Corn Growers were effective in Congress during the last year.

At this very moment, the administration is delaying the imposition of a higher import fee to give the sugar users a chance to get some cheap imported sugar under contract.

Nevertheless, consumer prices for sugar products rise to record levels. Neither the consumer nor the farmer is benefiting from this cheap, under cost of production sugar.

Fortunately, your national corn growers association was alert to the interests of corn growers, and worked closely with those of us in Congress seeking a better sugar program fair to corn growers, beet growers, cane growers, and consumers alike.

I commend you for your vigorous stand over the past year. I hope it will continue.

In summary, the following point needs to be emphasized. In the current marketing year, your corn prices could have been about 4 cents a bushel higher if the Carter administration had not mishandled the sugar program. The record sugar imports in 1977 prevented the use of about 60 million bushels of corn at refineries. A million tons of imported sugar was used instead. Your cash income was reduced by about $160 million.

MIRACLE OF AGRICULTURE

The family farm is an essential part of America, but it's a tough and risky business as you and I know all too well.

But as in any business, farmers must earn a profit. Just as any segment of our society, farmers want to provide a better life for their families and education for their children.

The miracle of American agriculture is that we are feeding an ever-increasing number of the world's people with an ever-decreasing number of producers. And that is our goal—yours and mine—to provide the right conditions and the right programs so that our farmers—large and small—can continue their production miracle.●

OPPOSITION TO POSSIBLE CLOSURE OF PARRIS ISLAND MARINE CORPS RECRUIT DEPOT

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, the citizens of Beaufort County, S.C., and surrounding areas were alarmed recently when the Navy Department announced that the Marine Corps was studying the possible closure of its recruit training depot at Parris Island.

That alarm is understandable. Parris Island, according to experts who have looked into the situation, provide nearly 50 percent of the total personal income of the Beaufort area. It is the major industry of the community. Any decision to close this base would have a disastrous effect on Beaufort.

But the alarm goes further than a purely economic concern. Mr. Barry L. Johnson, the president of the Beaufort Council of the Navy League, and Mr. Leroy H. Keyserling, national vice president of the Navy League, wrote to me recently concerning Parris Island, and they said, and I quote:

Over the years, we have been closely associated with Parris Island, and we know that in many ways it is Parris Island that makes Marines. Parris Island is more than a tradition to the Marine Corps; it is the Marine Corps.

They were expressing a concern for the future mission of the Marines and the effectiveness of the Marine Corps as an elite fighting force, and that expression goes much deeper than alarm over the local economy.

Members of the South Carolina congressional delegation, along with Mayor Henry Chambers of Beaufort, and Mr. Keyserling, met last week with Secretary of Defense Brown and Navy Secretary Claytor to discuss the Parris Island situation. Mr. Claytor said the study focused on arriving at the most cost-efficient training operation possible for the Marine Corps. He further pointed out that the most efficient operation possible might be a consolidation of basic training at Parris Island. I hope that is the decision, because I think Parris Island has proved its value over the years. And I hope the Navy Department can speed a decision so that the economic activity in the Beaufort area can begin moving again.

Mr. President, I ask at this time to have printed in the RECORD the letter on Parris Island from Mr. Johnson and Mr. Keyserling and, additionally, a copy of a resolution approved by the county council of Beaufort County opposing the possible closure of Parris Island.

The letter follows:

NAVY LEAGUE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C., July 14, 1978.

Hon. ERNEST F. HOLLINGS,
U.S. Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HOLLINGS: The Beaufort Council, Navy League of the U.S., is most distressed over the news that consideration is being given to closing or reducing Parris Island Marine Corps Recruit Training Depot. The Beaufort Council of the Navy League has the highest membership of any Navy League organization, on a pro-rata basis, based on the population area available for us to serve. Our 221 members earnestly cppose the closing or reducing of Parris Island.

Our opposition to the closing or reducing of Parris Island is based upon our assessment of the needs of the Marine Corps, the needs of the Beaufort community, and the needs of our country.

Over the years, we have been closely associated with Parris Island and we know that in many ways it is Parris Island that makes Marines. Parris Island is more than a tradition to the Marine Corps; it is the Marine Corps. We understand that most of the Marine Corps Recruits come from east of the Mississippi, and a large percentage therefrom come from the American South and it is only logical to continue operating Parris Island which is the only Marine Corps Recruit Depot on the east coast. We believe this is the most efficient, logical and reasonable way to operate Marine Corps recruit training requirements, even if it means consolidation of west coast facilities and/or reduction of same.

Locally, the Parris Island operation, and its effects, have tremendous impact in all areas of our community's life. Most fundamentally and importantly, it appears that the annual payroll of the U.S. Marine Corps Recruit Training Depot at Parris Island provides 47.5% of the total personal income of Beaufort. Alteration of this factor, by closing or reducing Parris Island, would have an unspeakably disasterous effect on this county, and this area of South Carolina.

As you well remember, several years ago, through your efforts, national attention was spotlighted on this part of S.C. because of its economic needs and the resultant unfilled social and humanitarian needs. Not the least of the disastrous effects would be on our University of South Carolina branch, here, and our public schools, due to military students and federal impacted area funds. This would have a chilling, if not crippling, effect on job and educational opportunities for minority and underprivileged children and adults. The programs initiated here and in nearby counties under your leadership and guidance would be greatly diminished in effect, upon any closing or reduction of Parris Island, with tremendous increases in welfare and public assistance applications as a likely result. The greatest negative effect here would be upon those who, probably, could least afford it. Most of our retirees have retirement incomes; the employees and persons directly affected by the Parris Island payroll are not yet similarly situated—they need that work-related income. To permit the closing or reduction of Parris Island, if for no other reason than simply the economic impact, would take us backward, locally, in the ability of local government and the local economy to provide a favorable climate in which people might live, work and have jobs.

With respect to the needs of our country, we believe that there is no area in the United States, and probably not in the world, where there is a more understanding and cooperative, warm and close relationship between the American defense establishment, as here represented by the U.S. Marines, and the civilian community. Indeed, our Beaufort Council of the Navy League has been instrumental in fostering, nurturing and assuring the fullness of this relationship. Our national defense effort requires this type of citizen's support for its efficiency and its strength. To close or reduce Parris Island is to sever those ties and thus destroy the circumstance which provides this great community support for Parris Island.

Your efforts will be more than appreciated by your many friends in this area, and all of us will be forever in your debt.

We urge and encourage you to study this matter carefully; weigh the factors relating to our national defense, our national economy, our local economy and upon your full reflection upon these matters, we rest quite assured that you will strongly oppose the closing or reducing of Parris Island.

With warm, personal regards, I am

Most sincerely,

BARRY L. JOHNSON,
President, Beaufort Council of the Navy League of the U.S.

LEROY H. KEYSERLING,
National Vice President, Navy League of the U.S. and Chairman, Marine Corps Affairs, Beaufort Council, Navy League of the U.S.

RESOLUTION OPPOSING THE CLOSING OF THE MARINE CORPS RECRUIT DEPOT

Whereas, the County Council of Beaufort County realizes the major contribution made by the Parris Island Marine Corps Recruit Depot to the citizens of our County; and

Whereas, the number of persons directly involved in the closing of this facility would be 10,494 military, civilian, and their dependents which would represent a 16.9% loss in population for the entire County due to the relocation of these employees; and

Whereas, the closing of this facility would cause a vacating of some 2,276 housing units, both rental and owner occupied; and

Whereas, this closing would affect the many retired families living in Beaufort County who rely on the military facilities which influence their decision to retire here; and

Therefore, be it resolved, that the County Council of Beaufort County on this 22nd day of May 1978, does hereby voice their opposition to the closing of the Parris Island Marine Corps Recruit Depot and offers support in maintaining this recruit depot in Beaufort County.

County Council of Beaufort County,
ARTHUR HORNE,
Chairman.●

GSA ADMINISTRATOR DESERVES SUPPORT

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, it has long been an axiom in business and in government that the man at the top must have the freedom of action to operate his company or department. This is especially true at a time of crisis.

At the moment, the General Services Administration is under siege with charges of corruption, mismanagement, and malfeasance. The indications are that these conditions have existed and festered over a long period of time.

Last year, the new Administrator of the General Services Administration, Jay Solomon, took over his job with full knowledge of the poor image his agency had.

As press reports began to show the magnitude of the problem, he took the first step by appointing a special counsel to conduct an investigation.

Since then he has taken strong stands to discipline GSA employees who have not only damaged the agency, but the entire Federal Government by their actions.

I have extreme confidence in Mr. Solomon and am certain he will continue to work to see that all the facts come out and that corruption and waste are eliminated in GSA.

To do this, he needs and deserves the total support of the administration and the Congress.

Mr. President, I take this occasion to offer my full support to Mr. Solomon and urge my colleagues to do the same.●

THE DANGERS OF A PERMISSIVE SOCIETY

● Mrs. ALLEN. Mr. President, Mr. G. V. Timmons, an 86-year-old retired high school teacher from Carrollton, Ala., recently sent me an article, "Riding Hood Today." This article was printed in the July 6, 1978, edition of the Pickens County Herald and West Alabamian, a fine weekly newspaper published in Carrollton by E. V. Junkin.

This article, whose author is unknown, cleverly parodies one of the tragic problems which faces our country today. I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

RIDING HOOD TODAY

"Tell me a story, daddy! Tell me a story."

"Once upon a time, in a faraway country, there lived a little girl called Red Riding Hood. One day her mother asked her to take a basket of fruit to her grandmother, who had been ill and lived alone in a cottage in the forest.

"It happened that a wolf was lurking in the bushes and overheard the conversation. He decided to take a shortcut to the grandmother's house and get the goodies for himself. The wolf killed the grandmother, then dressed in her nightgown and jumped into bed to await the little girl.

"When she arrived, he made several nasty suggestions and then tried to grab her. But by that time the child was very frightened and ran screaming from the cottage. A woodcutter, working nearby, heard her cries and rushed to the rescue. He killed the wolf with his ax, thereby saving Red Riding Hood's life. All the townspeople hurried to the scene and proclaimed the woodcutter a hero. But at the inquest, several facts emerged: (1) The wolf had never been advised of his rights. (2) The woodcutter had made no warning swings before striking the fatal blow. (3) The Civil Liberties Union stressed the point that although the act of eating Grandma may have been in bad taste, the wolf was only 'doing his thing' and thus didn't deserve the death penalty. (4) The SDS contended that the killing of the grandmother should be considered self-defense since she was over 30 and, therefore, couldn't be taken seriously because the wolf was trying to make love, not war.

"On the basis of these considerations, it was decided there was no valid basis for charges against the wolf. Moreover, the woodcutter was indicted for unaggravated assault with a deadly weapon. Several nights later, the woodcutter's cottage was burned to the ground. One year from the date of 'The incident at Grandma's' her cottage was made a shrine for the wolf who had bled and died there. All the village officials spoke at the dedication, but it was Red Riding Hood who gave the most touching tribute.

"She said that, while she had been selfishly grateful for the woodcutter's intervention, she realized in retrospect that he had overreacted. As she knelt and placed a wreath in honor of the brave wolf, there wasn't a dry eye in the whole forest.

"They named two bridges, one school, and a street for the wolf. Two denominations gave huge funds in his memory to reconcile all other wolves."●

UNITED STATES-MEXICAN RELATIONS

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, one of the more crucial aspects of our Nation's foreign policy—and an issue that involves our national interests as much, and perhaps more than any other foreign policy question—is the issue of United States-Mexican relations.

The ties between our two countries are strong and friendly, as are the ties that bind our two countries together. But the problems we share are also growing, and many issues between us will be contentious and difficult to handle under the best of conditions—from economic problems, migration issues, to differing political views.

Recently, Alan Riding, the New York Times correspondent in Mexico City, wrote an extraordinarily thoughtful piece on United States-Mexican relations—reviewing some of the problems we confront together and some of the issues we in the United States must face more directly and with a greater sense of urgency and priority.

I commend to the attention of Senators Mr. Riding's article in the Saturday Review, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

SILENT INVASION: WHY MEXICO IS AN AMERICAN PROBLEM

(By Alan Riding)

There was a time when the United States border with Mexico marked a clear line between the wealth, organization, and artificial flavorings of the north and the poverty, improvisation, and pungent spices of the south. Today that line is blurred. The United States has become an accepted presence in northern Mexico while Mexico has thrust cultural economic, and even political fists deep into the soft underbelly of the United States. In fact, Mexico is increasingly determining the mood and mores of the American Southwest and beyond.

The signs are everywhere: in the crowded American border cities, where unemployed Mexican boys strike in lightning raids, assaulting individuals, homes, and businesses; on Texas farms, where poor Mexican peasants provide cheap labor; in Arizona department stores, where rich Mexicans are the main clients; as far north as Chicago, where Mexicans run the drug underworld; and as far east as New York, where the major Mexican television newscast is broadcast nightly.

Mexico already is an American problem. But the cause of the problem is that Mexico itself is in deep trouble. The single party that has ruled the country for almost 50 years is now struggling to maintain its own and the nation's stability. The economic development that brought such a concentration of wealth during the postwar era is no longer functioning. Unemployment is so widespread that each year millions of Mexicans must cross illegally into the United States to work on farms as underpaid stoop laborers. Rural poverty remains endemic as urban slums swell. Even Mexico's new oil wealth offers little hope for a transformation of society. Solutions are being found arithmetically; problems are growing geometrically.

But to the United States, called upon to feed and finance much of the Third World, Mexico's problems still seem as distant as those of Brazil, Indonesia, or any other large backward nation. Washington does its bit to help them all, but it really feels that if only these countries could control their birthrate, their corruption, and their infantile nationalism, they would be much better off. And so the argument has run that if they don't want to help themselves, well, eventually, it's their problem and their poverty.

This has been the case with Mexico. Having seized half of Mexico's territory in 1848 and having intervened sporadically in the country for the next 70 years, the United States has been blessed with having a strong government south of the Rio Grande for much of the past half century. The contradiction of the world's richest nation sharing a 2,000-mile border with a traditionally violent and deeply impoverished country was suspended. Worrying successively about the Soviet Union, Nazi Germany, Japan, China, Korea, Vietnam, the Middle East, and southern Africa, Washington took Mexico for granted. So when political and economic instability began to surface there in 1976, it was treated like any other distant problem: given passing attention and then as the immediate crisis abated, forgotten.

The Carter administration has proved to be no more perceptive about Mexico—and perhaps even less so—than its predecessors were. Taking office at almost the same time, Jimmy Carter and Mexico's president José López Portillo decided to patch up the relations that were strained between 1973 and 1976 by then-president Luis Echeverría's Third World militancy. But Carter has acted only in a personal way, sending Rosalynn Carter to Mexico City for López Portillo's inauguration, on December 1, 1976, and to the Texas border last November to meet with Mrs. López Portillo; receiving the Mexican president last year as his first foreign guest; and sending Vice-President Walter Mondale down to Mexico City this past January, presumably to celebrate the new amigo ties. But even as diplomats and politicians feted the new rapprochement, Washington adopted policies certain to upset Mexico, and nation-to-nation relations deteriorated.

To be fair, the United States has treated Mexico as it might treat any other nation. And therein lies the problem. Struggling with a huge trade deficit, the United States has responded to Mexican complaints about American protectionism by pointing out that Mexico's tariff barriers are even higher. Trying to control inflation and to implement a sound energy policy, Washington has argued that it cannot pay more for Mexican-supplied natural gas than for domestic or Canadian. And with six million Americans out of work, the Carter administration has been pressured by the AFL–CIO to clamp down on the illegal immigration of impoverished, unemployed Mexicans. But while these policies are logical, they are not farsighted. It is in American interest to treat Mexico as a special case because the short-term cost of such a policy will be minimal compared with the long-term price of allowing the pressures of poverty and violence to continue building there.

The issue can be posed in three questions: Can the United States afford to stand by idly as Mexico's population doubles to 130 million by the year 2000 and the nation's precarious economic and political structures buckle under the strain? Can the United States expect to be unaffected if serious unrest breaks out so near to home? Can the United States continue to pretend that Mexico is not a crucial problem?

The Carter administration appears to see no problems ahead. Last August, without even consulting Mexico, it announced its immigration plan in the same chauvinistic tone that it might use to reveal any other domestic initiative. The bill, being taken up by Congress this summer, aims to reduce illegal immigration—85 percent of it comes from Mexico—by strengthening the U.S. Border Patrol and by penalizing American employers of undocumented aliens. As a concession, the bill would grant legal status to immigrants who can show that they have resided in the United States since before January 1, 1970. (Few Mexicans would benefit. Studies show that the majority come over on a seasonal basis or for only a couple of years at most.) Finally, for those who can show that they arrived before January 1, 1977, the bill contemplates a provisional status that would allow them to remain for a five-year trial period during which they would be expected to pay social security and other taxes but could not benefit from welfare. Naturally liberals object to the creation of second-class citizens—it may well be unconstitutional anyway—while many conservatives feel that the legalization of immigrants who are already established in the country is unnecessary. As a result, Mexico faces the prospect of a carrot-and-stick U.S. immigration law from which the carrot will have been removed by Congress.

But what impact will the stick have? First, the chances are that it won't succeed in stopping the flow of Mexicans to the north. So long as menial jobs are available in the United States—particularly on a seasonal basis on the farms of the Southwest—and unemployed peasants exist in Mexico, natural economic forces will bring supply and demand together. And with many Americans, including blacks, unwilling to become farm laborers even when they are jobless and with peasant unemployment growing in Mexico, the demand and the supply will exist indefinitely. The only way to stop the supply would be to militarize the 2,000-mile border, hardly an appealing prospect for a nation built up by immigrants who came in search of freedom and prosperity.

But, one could reasonably ask, could not the stick force Mexico to start to resolve its own problems? After all, the country's 25 million peasants have long been ignored by their various governments. Mexico also has one of the worst records in Latin America of corruption and the concentration of wealth. Action in these areas would not be amiss. Additionally, Mexico has a significant industrial sector, and its new oil and natural gas wealth should provide financing for further development. And if through the stick increased unemployment and unrest resulted in greater political pressure for change, would that be altogether bad? Perhaps not, but other factors complicate the picture.

Mexico's relative political stability rests on a bizarre coalition of political and economic forces that could break up if sudden change were promoted. Many of former president Echeverría's problems—not the least of which was the flight of capital that provoked the first devaluation of the peso in 22 years—came about because he denied domestic and foreign private-sector leaders and old-time political bosses immediate access to power.

The López Portillo administration has therefore been forced to rebuild this ruling coalition by wooing back those groups that had become dangerously alienated. And in doing so, it has once again emphasized political stability over social reform.

But the Catch-22 is that by choosing to have stability now, Mexico may be planting the seeds of future instability. Stability now means the preservation of an economic system that benefits one quarter of the population at most. Sustaining the status quo is a relatively small but growing middle class—comprising members of organized labor and the government bureaucracy—that is fully employed and that serves to extend the market for consumer goods. The rising expectations of this middle class make it press for its own economic demands to be met, but the group itself is an obstacle to any deep social reform.

Outside this 20 percent of the population that controls 70 percent of Mexico's wealth, living conditions are grim. Unemployment and underemployment affect over half of the 18-million-strong work force. Many others find work only for a few days a week or, in the countryside, for three months a year. Despite the postrevolutionary land reform, at least four million adult peasants are today without land, forced to follow the seasonal harvests in Mexico and the United States. Many peasants choose instead to migrate to Mexico's urban areas, where the unceasing influx has spawned huge slums that lack running water and minimal sanitation and that are known poignantly as "lost cities." This uncontrolled urbanization has made Mexico City the world's largest poor city. As a result, it is burdened by the inevitable symptoms of poverty: a population growth rate of 3.2 percent per year despite a new birth control program, malnutrition affecting 60 percent of adults and 80 percent of children under five, inadequate housing for 75 percent of the population, a functional illiteracy rate of 60 percent for adults, and a high infant mortality rate due to poor hygiene.

In this dark panorama, illegal immigration to the United States offers a ray of hope. For the government, it is an escape valve that each year removes at least one million people from the ranks of the unemployed. For individuals, it is a chance to earn good money for a few months or perhaps even to find a permanent job in an American city. For the families of those who migrate, it means at least survival and could provide the extra money needed to buy their children school uniforms or textbooks. And for the Mexican economy, it implies an injection of $2 billion to $3 billion sent home by the illegal workers.

The Carter administration has promised that there will be no mass roundups or deportations of undocumented Mexicans, but the real issue is whether or not the escape valve will be closed off in the future. Over the past three years, many workers in Mexico have been laid off because of the country's economic crisis, but every year, 800,000 new Mexicans have joined the job market for the first time. In order for unemployment to stabilize by the mid-1980s, more than one million new jobs must be created each year, yet senior Mexican government officials recognize that their target of even 150,000 new jobs a year is ambitious. So without the escape valve, unemployment and chaotic urbanization will accelerate, and social unrest will inevitably follow. And, significantly, those Mexicans who have the drive and ambition to risk going north of the border will become a new factor of political unrest, while those who were exposed to life in the United States will hardly be satisfied with their lot at home.

From a U.S. point of view, the fate of illegal immigration is only one of several variables because even if the immigration continues, Mexico cannot hope to solve its social crisis in the coming years. Mexico's oil wealth, being channeled into vast refinery and petrochemical projects, will create few jobs and at best will merely provide funds to subsidize supplementary food and basic welfare for the under- and unemployed. The rural sector, long the Achilles' heel of the economy, cannot aspire to efficiency unless it expels half its population, but then the cities will suffer further. In politics, the long-ruling Institutional Revoluntionary party (PRI) is still firmly in control of the government, but the absence of an equally institutionalized opposition is leading popular discontent and frustration to adopt more chaotic and violent forms of expression. The López Portillo administration is aware of the trend and is encouraging new political parties to grow in the shadow of the PRI. But if urban and rural violence grow, greater repression will become inevitable, creating an even more explosive situation.

What then can the United States do about Mexico? How can the United States minimize the problems that are being exported by its neighbor? Clearly, moralizing about the inequities and corruption of Mexico does not help. Taking Mexico as it is, what can be done?

Whenever a wave of concern about developments in Mexico sweeps Washington, it provokes talk of a "Marshall Plan" for the country. At first sight, the idea is appealing. But the nature of the challenge is very different: In Europe, Washington helped to rebuild sophisticated societies that had been shattered by a single event; in Mexico, it would have to develop something from nothing and to go against the trends of international economic relations to do it. Additionally, Europe was ready to receive American help, while Mexico's nationalistic pride has always led it to reject American aid.

Different schemes are nevertheless being mooted. Congressman Henry Gonzalez, sensitive to the influence of Mexico in his home state of Texas, has proposed the idea of a $2 billion joint fund to stimulate the development of those regions of Mexico that "export" the most illegal aliens to the United States. But Mexico already has a $30 billion foreign debt and an $80 billion gross national product, so another $2 billion would hardly be felt. On the other hand, former CIA director William E. Colby is one of the few public figures who seem to recognize that unless solutions are found to Mexico's crisis, "social tensions between the Spanish- and English-speaking communities [in the United States] will produce violence, misery, and turmoil." His proposals though seem less than practical. In a recent article in Worldview magazine, Colby suggested a U.S.-financed food stamp program aimed at the poor of Mexico, Central America, and the Caribbean. Individuals would spend the food stamps in the marketplace, and those same stamps would then be used as currency to purchase further imports of surplus American food. But apart from the inevitable danger of abuse and corruption, such a program would discourage local production of staple foods and stimulate a switch to more lucrative export crops, which would result in huge profits for rich farmers and in the need to provide even more welfare for the poor. More important, the program would not be a strong enough magnet to keep Mexicans from immigrating to the United States.

Clearly, there are no simple measures that the United States can adopt; but as a first step in demonstrating a degree of understanding and in instituting new measures, the Carter administration should withdraw its immigration proposals. Even if they are never adopted, discussion of them will create a psychological barrier to more realistic solutions to the Mexican problem. In the short run in fact, the government should allow the forces of supply and demand to control the ebb and flow of Mexicans across the border. In the long run, the government could institutionalize this flow by signing a seasonal workers accord with Mexico similar to the so-called Bracero Agreement that operated until stopped by Congress, in 1964. The accord would meet the labor demands of farmers in the Southwest and would ensure that the workers return to Mexico once the season was over. Not surprisingly, this is a solution favored by Secretary of Agriculture Bob Bergland, who is fully aware that unemployed Americans are not willing to do stoop labor. But Congress will take more persuading. The AFL-CIO is strongly opposed to a new Bracero Agreement, but it must be convinced that its interests will be harmed more by the continuation of illegal immigration. Organized labor must also learn to separate the threat from the cheap labor in, say, Taiwan or Brazil from the more complex Mexican issue.

President López Portillo has frequently stated that he prefers Mexico to export products rather than people to the United States. But to do so, Mexico requires a special trade deal with the United States. At present, Mexico benefits from the generalized system of trade preference, and it recently signed a bilateral agreement with Washington that eliminated tariffs on $64 million worth of its agricultural products and on $32 million worth of U.S. exports. But many Mexican exports to the United States are in practice blocked by such nontariff barriers as quotas and frequently specious quality controls on such products as tomatoes, strawberries, and winter vegetables Congress is opposed to granting Mexico specialized trade preferences, but it would be an act of great vision if it were to do so.

On a less ambitious scale, Mexico would like to extend the current system of labor-intensive border assembly plants to the more depressed regions of the country. Under this system, raw materials are imported from the United States, assembled in Mexico, and reexported to the United States, with duty paid only on the value added. But while this scheme succeeded in launching industry in Puerto Rico, the AFL-CIO is campaigning for the relevent U.S. tariff provisions to be revoked because American firms are running away to cheaper labor in Mexico. Extending the system beyond the border area, where some 40,000 jobs are currently provided to Mexicans, will therefore depend on a more understanding attitude by Congress. The idea is attractive to Mexico because it would enable new industries to take off in nonindustrial areas. These industries would then gradually use more Mexican raw materials and, hopefully, eventually be able to compete at home and abroad.

One irony is that while the United States should act on these questions for purely selfish reasons, Mexico has something to offer as evidence of the two countries' growing interdependence. After Saudi Arabia, Mexico probably has the world's largest oil reserves, and while production is now only 1.25 million barrels per day (bd), oil exports will reach 574,000 bd by the end of this year and 1.2 million bd by 1980. With proven reserves of 17 billion barrels and probable reserves of between 60 billion and 100 billion barrels, Mexico can assure the United States a secure supply of oil for the rest of this century. But because the United States continues to pressure rather than to aid the Mexican economy, the Lopez Portillo administration is seeking new markets for the country's oil in order to avoid excessive dependence on United States purchases. Extraordinarily, at the same time as it is turning a blind eye to Mexico's social crisis, Washington is also failing to recognize the importance of the country's oil and natural gas. The two attitudes are related and unrelated. If Mexico is treated as a special case as far as immigration, trade, and investment are concerned, the United States can feel secure about its oil. But if Mexico continues to be treated as if it were any other distant developing nation, no amount of oil wealth will prevent its social and political problems from spilling over into the United States.●

PRELIMINARY NOTIFICATION PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $25 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $7 million. Upon receipt of such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be prohibited by means of a concurrent resolution. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sale shall be sent to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Pursuant to an informal understanding, the Department of Defense has agreed to provide the committee with a preliminary notification 20 days before transmittal of the official notification. The official notification will be printed in the RECORD in accordance with previous practice.

I wish to inform Members of the Senate that such a notification was received on July 27, 1978.

Interested Senators may inquire as to the details of this preliminary notification at the offices of the Committee on Foreign Relations, room S-116 in the Capitol.

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, D.C., July 27, 1978.

In reply refer to: I-6890/78ct.

Dr. HANS BINNENDIJK,

DEAR DR. BINNENDIJK: By letter dated 18 February 1976, the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, indicated that you would be advised of possible transmittals to Congress of information as required by Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act. At the instruction of the Department of State, I wish to provide the following advance notification.

The Department of State is considering an offer to a Near Eastern country tentatively estimated to cost in excess of $25 million.

Sincerely,

ERICH F. VON MARBOD,
Acting Director,
Defense Security Assistance Agency.●

EXTENDING THE ARMS SALES REVIEW PERIOD

● Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, S. 3075, the International Security Assistance Act of 1978, which was approved by the Senate on July 26, contains an important change in the congressional review procedures for foreign military sales. Section 24 of the act permits an additional period of 30 days for Congress to consider arms sales notifications submitted under section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act if a two-thirds vote of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee or of the House International Relations Committee requests a one-time extension of the initial 30-day review period.

One year ago today, President Carter was forced to withdraw his first proposal for selling AWACS aircraft to Iran because congressional concerns could not be satisfied within the 30-day deadline. It was clear that this short period was inadequate for Congress to evaluate and act on difficult arms sales issues, which can involve assessment of highly sophisticated technology and regional military balances as well as complex foreign policy judgments. Moreover, the AWACS episode demonstrated the great difficulty for the Congress of completing action by two or more subcommittees, two committees, and both Houses in 30 calendar days. If the legislative review provisions for foreign military sales is to be a responsible and effective exercise, we must not be forced to accept or reject an arms sale because of the clock.

After the Iranian AWACS experience, I suggested that there should be a legal mechanism to extend when necessary the arms sales review period for an additional 30 days. This is an appropriate formula that allows prompt consummation of noncontroversial sales while providing more time for thorough congressional consideration and action on objectionable sales proposals.

I want to commend the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for adopting a similar provision in the International Security Assistance Act of 1978, and urge the House of Representatives to do likewise. The extension procedure would contribute significantly to the ability of the Congress to responsibly review U.S. foreign military sales programs.●

THE LATE REVEREND ELDEN G. BUCKLIN

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am sure that each of our lives have been touched by one individual who has left us a better person and enabled us to have a better understanding of ourselves and increased love for and appreciation of our fellow man. In the case of many of my fellow Vermonters, such a man was the late Reverend Elden G. Bucklin of Putney, Vt.

In terms of time, dedication, unselfishness and devotion to love of God and His work, Reverend Bucklin was akin to the early "circuit riders" who traveled through our early history by horseback, thinking little of their own needs, but giving unsparingly of their time and love to the families of the early frontier.

The "Parson," as he was known throughout Vermont, had a humble beginning which molded his character for the life to which he was called. Left without parents at an early age, he worked 12 hours a day in a drug store, his meals consisting of snacks at the drug counter, making just enough money to pay his rent on the small one room which was his home. He later was befriended by the parents of a fellow worker who took him in as a foster son. His adopted family was responsible for the "Parson" attending college, studying for the ministry. He further aided his tuition, in respect for the work ethic, by washing pots and pans in a campus restaurant.

The "Parson" never forgot the lessons of love that he learned from the hardships of his youth. During the 50 years he served as an ordained minister in six separate churches he always found time to share his life with the youth of today. In the last 42 years of his ministry he devoted many hours counseling the youth groups of his churches, attending Grange youth camps, giving inspirational sermonettes, teaching and having just plain fun. In addition to his work with the Grange youth, he shared his zest for life and love of youth as a Boy Scout leader in his native State of Rhode Island as well as in Vermont.

The "Parson" touched many lives, in his churches, Boy Scouts, senior citizens, Odd Fellows and especially the Vermont State Grange and Rhode Island State Grange, where he served as State chaplain. Elected to the office in Rhode Island in 1926, he served until 1948 when he accepted the call to the United Church in Colchester, Vt. Shortly thereafter he was elected to the office of chaplain of the Vermont State Grange, serving until his calling in 1976.

One of the "Parson's" many acts of being about his Father's business was a few year ago when he sat up for 3 weeks with a young child who was dying of sleeping sickness. The "Parson" was not one to shirk his other pastoral duties but added this vigil of love and comfort as an outward expression of his understanding of the mysteries of life and death.

Death came to the "Parson" on March 16, 1976, while he was still serving members of the Federated Church as Putney, Vt.

The Vermont State Grange honored "Parson" on Sunday, July 9, 1978, by dedicating the Bucklin Memorial Chapel, located on a wooded Vermont hillside next to the grange center at Brookfield, Vt.

We in Vermont have been honored to share this wonderful man's life of service with our sister State of Rhode Island and I would like to share with all my colleagues the life of this dedicated servant of our Maker.

"PARSON"

Rev. Elden G. Bucklin was born in Pawtucket, Rhode Island on February 13, 1903. In 1925 he opened a church in Arcadia, Rhode Island, which had been closed for some time. He was ordained as a minister of the gospel in 1926. During the 50 years of his ministry, he served 6 churches:

Arcadia Baptist Church, Arcadia, R.I., 1925–1926; Chepachet Union Church, Chepachet, R.I., 1926–1948; North Foster, R.I. Church and Hopkins Mills Union Church, 1928–1948; United Church, Colchester, Vt. 1948–1968; and Federated Church, Putney, Vt., 1968–1976.

Called to his heavenly home March 16, 1976.

He served as Chaplain of the Rhode Island State Grange from 1926 to 1948 and of the Vermont State Grange from 1948 to 1976. He served for 17 years as Grand Chaplain of the Grand Lodge-Odd Fellows of Vermont and as Sovereign Grand Chaplain of the World Odd Fellows. He enjoyed the distinction of serving as Grange State Chaplain of both Rhode Island and Vermont for 2 months during his transition to Vermont. He attended and held classes at all the Vermont State Grange youth camps since their inception.

During his ministry, he received many honors among which being named the Baptist Minister of the Year in 1976 by the Vermont Baptist State Convention and a citation for distinguished service from the Rhode Island Baptist State Convention. In 1940 he was the recipient of the Rosa Hall Award for distinguished service to town and country churches awarded by the Baptist Home Mission Society.

He was married to Beatrice F. Keach on June 27, 1927. They were blessed with one son, Elden G. Bucklin, Jr., and three grandchildren.

"How Great Thou Art."

I talked with my good friend, John Scott, the master of the National Grange while he was returning from the dedication of the Bucklin Memorial Chapel. I mention this because of the high regard we Vermonters have for Mr. Scott and because it was so fitting he would be present at the dedication.

I was not privileged to know "Parson" intimately but because my life has been touched by one quite similar, I feel him as an intimate friend and I am sure you will, too. Thank you, Mr. President, for allowing us this time to share in the life of a great Vermonter, the Reverend Elden G. Bucklin.●

ANNOUNCEMENT OF POSITION ON AMENDMENT NO. 3248 TO HOUSING AND COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT BILL

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, last Thursday morning, July 20, 1978, the Senate considered an amendment, numbered 3248 to the Housing and Community Development bill (S. 3084). Due to the traffic jam caused by the Metro transit strike in the District of Columbia, I was unavoidably delayed arriving at the Senate, and reached the Senate Chamber just as the 15-minute rollcall expired. Had I been present, I would have voted against the amendment, which I believe alters the original intention of the urban development action grant program in such a way as to channel Federal funds away from the economically declining cities in the Northeast and Midwest "UDAG" was designed to help.

GSA MAY BE WASTING MILLIONS BY FAILING TO REQUIRE COMPETITIVE BIDDING

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the General Services Administration is known as the Federal Government's housekeeper. It arranges for the construction of Federal buildings and provides for their maintenance as well as security.

This is a vast responsibility and involves the expenditure of millions of dollars in taxpayer money each year.

Unfortunately, as a General Accounting Office report on GSA contracting procedures reveals, the GSA does not appear to be awarding construction and repair contracts with the degree of care necessary to insure that the Government is not overcharged for the work provided.

I asked the Comptroller General to evaluate how effectively GSA was observing Federal contracting procedures which require, except for unusual circumstances, competitive bidding on all contracts. Unfortunately, GAO found:

There appears to be too high a proportion of negotiated contracts, overly liberal interpretations of public exigency to justify negotiation, and little or no competition for any advertised and negotiated awards.

The GAO study found that GSA preferred to award, without the required competitive bidding, 13.4 percent of repair and alteration contracts valued at $10,000 or more, and to award without competitive bidding 12.7 percent of new construction valued at $10,000 or above.

In many cases, GSA excused the bypassing of competitive bids procedures by claiming the award of the contract was a "public exigency." However, the GAO found that many of these claimed public exigencies were nonexistent.

Clearly, the GAO report leaves the impression that GSA is playing favorites, rather than trying to get the best job done for the least amount of money to the American taxpayer.

Mr. President, I ask that the GAO report to me on the GSA contract award procedures be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE,
Washington, D.C., July 6, 1978.

Hon. CHARLES H. PERCY,
Ranking Minority Member, Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, Committee on Governmental Affairs, U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR PERCY: In response to your letter of February 17, 1977, requesting that we review certain management practices of the General Services Administration (GSA), we reported the results of our review of Construction Management Division activities in the Boston Region (LCD–78–304, Jan. 17, 1978). As agreed with your representative, your requested nationwide statistical profile, modified to show GSA's use of advertised and negotiated contracts for new construction and major repairs and alterations, would be the subject of a later report.

On May 24, 1978, we orally reported the results of our data gathering and analyses to your representatives. The statistical inferences indicate that restricted competition may preclude assurance that awards are made at reasonable prices. There appears to be too high a proportion of negotiated contracts, overly liberal interpretations of public exigency to justify negotiation, and little or no competition for many advertised and negotiated awards.

We pointed out that without examining contract files and interviewing the responsible persons, one cannot conclusively determine whether or not the contracting method, the basis for negotiation, or a lack of competition is inappropriate in any individual case. It was agreed, however, that we need to promptly report these indicators of serious inadequacies in GSA's contracting practices to the Administrator of General Services. We are suggesting to the Administrator that his recently formed task force—on activities most susceptible to criminal abuse—consider this information and investigate specifically the sufficiency of competition in the Public Building Service's construction and repair and alteration contract work. Attachment I is a copy of the report to the Administrator (LCD–78–330) issued on this date.

At the request of your representatives, we made brief visits to two GSA regional offices (Chicago and San Francisco) to review examples and any readily available explanations of noncompetitive awards, as well as the circumstances considered by GSA to involve such compelling and unusual urgency as to constitute public exigencies requiring negotiation rather than public advertising and competitive bidding. Attachment II shows some of these examples.

It should be noted that the work requested was statstical analysis and inference—as reported in the letter to the Administrator—and that attachment II may not show the most representative or best examples of unnecessary restricted competition. While these individual cases and others in the contract files we examined do not contradict but generally support our statistical inferences, our examinations and inquiries were not complete and do not eliminate the need for closer study by the Administrator's task force.

Trusting that this report satisfies your request for a nationwide statistical profile, we are not planning further work at this time. As arranged with your office, further distribution of the report will be made 7 days after the issuance date unless you publicly release its contents before this time.

Sincerely yours,

R. G. ROTHWELL,
(For F. J. SHAFER, Director).

U.S. GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE,
Washington, D.C.

Hon. JOEL W. SOLOMON,
Administrator of General Services.

DEAR MR. SOLOMON: We recently completed a statistical analysis of the General Services Administration's (GSA's) contract awards for construction and major repairs and alterations of buildings, at the request of Senator Charles H. Percy, Ranking Minority Member of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs. The purpose of our analysis was to give Senator Percy a general picture of GSA's contracting for these services, in terms of degree of competition, use of and justifications for negotiated contracts, variations among regions, and any similar characteristics bearing on restricted competition and possible favoritism.

For this purpose your office provided us with computer printouts detailing and summarizing data on all such contracts awarded for over $10,000 in calendar years 1974–76. We also looked at the contract files documenting some of these awards in your Chicago and San Francisco regions for examples and any readily available explanations of noncompetitive awards (made after receiving less than three bids or proposals) and the use of public exigency to justify negotiation.

As we advised Senator Percy, our analysis raises questions about the sufficiency of competition in GSA's contract awards. Because we did not audit the data or examine any contract awards in detail, we consider the results of our analysis to be only indicators of serious inadequacies in GSA's contracting practices which require further study. You may wish to use our findings in your current efforts to improve procurement management.

The data for the 3 years show awards of 324 new construction contracts for a total of about $335 million, and 1,610 contracts for major repairs and alterations for about $177 million. The enclosure contains five tables of information on these contracts; they identify the use of negotiated contracts, justifications for negotiated awards, and extent of competition obtained. The most significant indicators of potential problems are described below.

HIGH PROPORTION OF NEGOTIATED CONTRACTS

Tables 1 and 2 show that about 13 percent of all contracts were negotiated awards. In terms of the total value of these contracts, negotiation covered over 6 percent of new construction awards and nearly 10 percent of repairs and alterations. The nature of construction and repair work and the large number of firms generally operating in most localities do not seem to require such a high degree of negotiated, rather than formally advertised, procurements.

Furthermore, the numbers of negotiated contracts shown are less than the actual awards, because those negotiated with the Small Business Administration and businesses eligible under section 8(a) of the Small Business Act were misclassified as advertised contract awards rather than as negotiated awards otherwise authorized by law. Section 8(a) awards, and other small business set-asides authorized under section 302 (c)(15) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, were not specifically identified in the computer printouts, but we would normally expect small business to be one of the most frequently cited justifications for negotiated awards. There is added reason, therefore, to question the need for GSA's large number of negotiated awards shown in the data provided to us.

Table 3 shows the statutory exceptions which were used to justify negotiation rather than formal advertising procedures for the 257 negotiated awards. Public exigency (some type of emergency situation requiring immediate contracting) was used for more than 174 cases—the majority of all negotiated awards for both new construction and major repairs and alterations. The number is nearly 10 percent of all the contracts for these services, seemingly a very high proportion of emergency situations. We scanned the underlying information and noted some services that appear to be doubtful cases of public exigency. Among these were: (1) new construction awards for landscaping, miscellaneous concrete, and completion of interior finishes and (2) major repair and alteration awards for renovation design work, painting and decorating, and additional bookshelving.

The second and third most frequent reasons for negotiation were the impracticality of securing competition (45 instances) and the unsatisfactory bids obtained after advertising (33 cases). In regard to the impracticality of competing for major repairs and alterations, there may have been appropriate justifications for negotiation in those cases where the nature and scope of the work was not certain—contrasted with the availability of work descriptions and specifications for new constuction. Although these reasons for negotiation are to be used to get competition not attainable by advertising, the actual extent of competition obtained by GSA generally seems inadequate.

Referring again to tables 1 and 2, the GSA regions varied widely in their use of negotiation. For new construction, the highest proportion of their total numbers and/or value of contracts negotiated was experienced by Boston, San Francisco, and Auburn. Negotiated major repair and alteration awards were particularly heavy in New York, Washington, Chicago, and Denver.

LITTLE OR NO COMPETITION FOR MANY CONTRACTS AWARDED

Table 4 shows the range of bidders responding to invitations for formally advertised contracts. The unusual feature is that over 20 percent of the awards for which pertinent data was available (both new construction and major repairs and alterations) were made after receiving only one or two bids.

Formal advertising requires a minimum of two prospective sources; the award is made to the lowest responsive and responsible bidder. However, all of the bids may be rejected if the prices are unreasonable or the competition is inadequate to insure reasonable prices.

If less than three bids are received, the contracting officer may make the award, but the Federal Procurement Regulations require that he determine whether the small number of bids received is due to an absence of the prerequisites of formal advertising. These include nonrestrictive specifications, wide dissemination of announcements on prospective procurements before issuing invitations for bids, and sufficient time for bid preparation. The record of the invitation for bids must include the contracting officer's recommendation on action needed to get more than one or two bids in future procurements.

Table 5 shows the extent of competition for contracts awarded after negotiations. Although one might expect less competition because of the conditions justifying use of negotiated awards, the amount actually obtained is so limited that it is questionable. Only one or two firms responded in 17 of 41 new construction procurements and in 92 of 216 major repair and alteration awards—over 40 percent of all such awards. The average contract value in these cases was below the average of all negotiated contracts for new construction, but above the average of all contracts in the case of major repairs and alterations. For the latter type of work particularly, awards made after negotiating with only one or two firms were for relatively large amounts.

The combined data from tables 4 and 5 show that a total of 409 contracts were awarded for all types of work when only one or two firms responded. That represents about 25 percent of the 1,686 contracts for which pertinent data was available. With a record of such limited competition, there may be serious inadequacies in GSA's contracting procedures for construction and major repairs and alterations. Do the procurement offices develop and maintain adequate lists of potential bidders for various types of work? Does the work planning system allow sufficient time for developing specifications and advertising before the work must begin? Are procurement offices soliciting a reasonably wide range of firms for these contract awards? Are potential contractors not bidding because they are reluctant to accept terms and conditions associated with Government contracting?

OBSERVATIONS

After the allegations of fraud, favoritism, and kickbacks in GSA's contracting activities, you started several internal surveys of the agency's procurement management, and took or are planning to take such positive actions as strengthening your Office of Audits and Investigations, separating contract award and inspection activities, and refining methods of procurement solicitation so that orders are not limited to the same few businesses.

We also understand that you recently formed a task force to thoroughly investigate activities most susceptible to criminal abuse and recommend corrective actions. The information in this report is directly related to the thrust of that investigation. We suggest, therefore, that your task force specifically consider this information and cover (1) the efforts of the procurement offices to obtain competition for construction and repair and alteration contract work and (2) the reasonableness of the justifications for using negotiated procurement for such work.

If your office has any questions about the statistical tables in the enclosure or our analyses of the data, we would be pleased to meet with you.

Sincerely yours,

R. G. ROTHWELL,
(For F. J. Shafer, Director).

| Others | 5 | 232, 811 |
| Total | 257 | 38, 196, 259 |

[1] When GSA showed more than 1 justification for the negotiated contract, we divided the contract number and dollar value equally between the justifications in order to maintain the integrity of the total contract number count and values. For example, in the case of public exigency as a justification, there were 163 awards justified solely on that basis and 22 awards justified by more than 1 reason. We divided the latter cases between public exigency and the other reasons.

[1] The degree of competition was not identified by GSA for advertised contracts which had been completed and transferred to records centers at the time of our review. After eliminating these contracts, the percentages of contracts awarded on the basis of less than 3 bids are 19 percent for new construction, 22 percent for major repairs and alterations, and 21 percent overall.

EXAMPLES OF NONCOMPETITIVE AWARDS AND CIRCUMSTANCES DETERMINED BY GSA TO BE PUBLIC EXIGENCIES REQUIRING NEGOTIATION

EXAMPLE 1

Citing public exigency, a $78,537 contract was negotiated and awarded on September 30, 1976, for roofing repairs at the Federal Service Center Building, Bell, California.

In justifying negotiation, GSA noted that the roof had deteriorated and would continue to do so unless a protective coating was applied before the rainy season, and that funds had become available shortly before the end of the fiscal year. GSA determined that the requirement involved compelling and unusual urgency and called for negotiation to meet the deadline.

We noted that (1) documentation in the files does not explain the deadline and the additional time required for public advertising that might jeopardize meeting the deadline and (2) the contract was awarded on the last day of the fiscal year.

EXAMPLE 2

Citing public exigency, a $42,745 contract was negotiated and awarded on May 27, 1976, for exterior sculpture foundations at the U.S. Courthouse, Federal Office Building and Parking Facility, San Diego, California.

In its justification, GSA noted that funds for this project were going to expire. GSA found that the remaining short time did not permit solicitation of bids and that the unusual urgency could not tolerate delay incident to formal advertising.

We noted that (1) GSA's citation of public exigency to award a contract before expiration of funds is a questionable interpretation of section 302(c)(2) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act, as amended, and (2) documentation made available to us mentioned "critical time frames of construction completion" but did not explain how the Government would be seriously injured, financially or otherwise, if these services were not furnished by a certain time.

Citing public exigency, a $134,000 contract was negotiated and awarded on September 22, 1976, for partitions and related items at the Federal Center, Battle Creek, Michigan.

GSA's support for use of public exigency was that (1) relocation of some elements of the Air Force Logistics Command, which started May 1, 1976, was scheduled to be completed January 1, 1977, (2) time lost in failing to award the contract by advertising had reduced the available time for performing the work needed to accommodate the proposed relocation, and (3) solicitation by public advertising "does not afford us the negotiating opportunities * * * which could preclude long delays due to possible irregularities in submitted proposals."

We noted that bids had been solicited as early as October 1974, a sole bid was rejected because it was about 50 percent over the Government estimate, and a decision was made to readvertise. Bids were again solicited in May 1976, and in August 1976 all four bids received were "rejected because inadequate and defective specifications were cited in the bid forms."

In its rejection decision, the Board of Awards said: "the errors, omissions, and discrepancies of specifications are numerous. The specifications are considered to be so defective that fair and equal effective competition cannot be accomplished."

The Board recommended that the specifications and bid forms be thoroughly reviewed and corrected before resolicitation.

This seems to be a type of situation meriting close examination by the Administrator's task force for (1) possible overly liberal use of public exigency and (2) from a remedial viewpoint, insufficient planning by the GSA procurement office and failure to develop suitable specifications before the work must be started.

EXAMPLE 4

An advertised $803,240 contract was awarded to a sole responsive bidder in July 1974 for a new courtroom on the 19th floor of the Everett McKinley Dirksen Building, Chicago, Illinois, and for miscellaneous alterations on the 7th and 20th floors for agencies relocated by the courtroom work.

The contract files given to us did not have documentation related to the work request, the pre-invitation solicitations of interest or publicizing in trade journals, the actual solicitations or data thereon, an abstract of bids, or recommendations of a Board of Award. The files we examined did not include the contracting officer's recommendation on action needed to get more than two bids on future procurements, as called for in 41 CFR 1-2.407-1(b).

The contracting officer rejected the low bid as non-responsive because it did not meet the bid guarantee and other conditions. The award was made to the 2nd (of two low bidder, "such bid having been found fair, reasonable and responsive to the invitation."

This type of situation seems to merit close examination by the Administrator's task force for (1) the adequacy of pre-invitation publicizing and lists of potential bidders for various types of work and (2) the sufficiency of the basis for deciding if prices bid are fair and reasonable.

EXAMPLE 5

Citing public exigency, a $287,000 contract was negotiated and awarded on February 27, 1975, for construction at the U.S. Border Station, San Diego, California.

In its justification, GSA stated a need to complete the inspection facilities within 6 months to (1) relieve the annual summer tourist traffic delays, (2) avoid higher labor wage rates after July 1, 1975, (3) maintain the existing excellent relations with Mexico, and (4) increase efficiency and productivity.

The claimed benefits of negotiation were illustrated by comparing a normal (presumably advertising) acquisition schedule with the actual schedule planned. This comparison showed a decrease of 15 days in the bid/award period (from 1 month to ½ month) and a decrease of 4½ months in the design period (from 6 months to 1½ months).

We questioned whether maintaining good relations and increasing efficiency represent compelling needs of unusual exigency. Also, we noted that the contract price escalated from $287,000 to about $350,000—an increase of about 22 percent—even though we could not establish that the cost increase resulted from the 75-percent reduction in design time or the lack of full competition.

FOREIGN-BRIBERY ACT IMPOSES TOUGH RULES ON THE BOOKKEEPING OF ALL PUBLIC FIRMS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this morning the Wall Street Journal carried an article analyzing the provisions of the foreign bribery legislation passed in this Congress. The legislation prohibits American companies from bribing foreign government officials.

The bribery of foreign officials by American companies became a huge national and international scandal, undermining the integrity of our domestic capital markets and complicating our foreign policy. Corporate bribery of foreign officials was largely accomplished by the maintenance of off-the-record slush funds aided and abetted by sloppy internal management controls.

The bribery legislation—the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act—goes to the heart of the problem. It requires corporations subject to the jurisdiction of the Securities and Exchange Commission to maintain accurate books and records in reasonable detail and to maintain internal accounting controls. These statutory requirements should stop corporate bribery. The benefits of this legislation are enormous potentially: competition for foreign business may truly take place in accordance with free market principles, our democratic image abroad should be enhanced and corporations should be better managed.

Mr. President, the article quotes one person as saying that the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act is the most significant legislation affecting business passed in many years. I agree with this observation. I commend this article to my colleagues and request unanimous consent that it be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, July 28, 1978]

FOREIGN-BRIBERY ACT IMPOSES TOUGH RULES ON THE BOOKKEEPING OF ALL PUBLIC FIRMS

(By Charles N. Stabler)

NEW YORK—Under the new Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, it is becoming clear, you don't have to be either operating in foreign lands or corrupt to be in trouble.

The measure was enacted late last year following months of hearings and investigations by Congress and the Securities and Exchange Commission into "questionable" activities by U.S. companies abroad. More than 300 American corporations were revealed to have maintained secret slush funds overseas, bribed foreign officials or paid excessive commissions in a quest for sales and favorable treatment in other nations.

Despite all this uproar, an executive of a company that didn't do any foreign business and didn't engage in corrupt activities might take a detached view of the new legislation. But that would be a mistake.

"The act is the most significant legislation affecting businesses, all businesses, in many years," warns Norman E. Auerbach, chairman of Coopers & Lybrand, a major auditing firm. Coopers and other accounting firms are rushing to inform corporate clients about implications of the new law and to help them comply with it.

"The title of the new act doesn't communicate its scope fully," says a study by Arthur Young & Co., another major auditor. Although the law does make specifically illegal what previously were "questionable" foreign payments and provides stiff fines and prison terms for violations, it does much more as well.

BOOKKEEPING PROVISION

Because much corrupt activity abroad was concealed through secret foreign bank accounts or was falsely recorded, the act requires companies to keep good accounting records. According to the Senate Banking Committee, the law requires companies that issue securities to the public "to maintain books and records which accurately and fairly reflect the transactions of the corporation and to design an adequate system of internal controls to assure, among other things, that the assets of the issuer are used for proper corporate purposes."

Moreover, this accounting mandate applies not just to corporations with foreign interests. As an amendment to the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, it applies to all public companies.

At first glance, the requirement for good record-keeping and controls may appear unexceptionable; no one advocates phony bookkeeping. But some analysts warn that the new law has created troubling uncertainties for the conduct of businesses, armed the SEC and possibly other regulatory agencies with a powerful new enforcement weapon and increased the legal liability of corporate executives and directors.

Already, there has been indications of the law's broad sweep. Earlier this year, the SEC charged Aminex Resources Corp. and several former officers of the New York coal company with misappropriating more than $1.2 million of Aminex assets under cover of improper accounting and in violation of the new law. Significantly, the case doesn't involve foreign payments in any way.

In addition, the new law is cited in a still-pending SEC action against Page Airways Inc. and six of its executives. The case includes allegations of corrupt foreign payments to promote aircraft sales abroad. The SEC doesn't charge that the law's antibribery provisions were violated, apparently because the alleged payments preceded its Dec. 17, 1977, effective date. But it does accuse the defendants of violating the accounting provisions through continuing failure to reflect the transactions accurately on Page's books. (A Page attorney said earlier that the charges have "no merit" and that the company will defend itself in court.)

Efforts to broaden the law's application seem assured, analysts say. They cite, for example, a March memo to Harold Williams, the SEC's chairman, from Harvey L. Pitt, its general counsel, about independent audit committees. Such committees, made up of nonemploye directors on corporate boards, usually are charged with monitoring internal accounting controls and working with the outside auditors.

Both the SEC and many accountants favor such committees, and most major companies already have them. But the question of who, if anyone, has the authority to order them for all companies stirs considerable disagreement.

In his memo, Mr. Pitt says the new law, coupled with the SEC's general rule-making authority, "could provide the basis for a commission rule requiring issuers . . . to utilize an independent audit committee." He concedes that establishment of such a committee "isn't in itself an element of a system of internal accounting control," but he adds: "The commission could, however, determine that the establishment of an independent audit committee, charged with communicating with the issuer's outside auditors, is a 'necessary and appropriate' means of implementing" the law's requirement for a proper internal control system.

THREAT OF "INTRUSION"

Mr. Pitt's comments disturb Coopers & Lybrand's Mr. Auerbach. Such a policy, Mr. Auerbach says, "could end up as the basis for continuing intrusion into corporate governance, through the side door."

Be that as it may, the SEC said earlier this month that it is "likely to require, in reports filed with it, a representation that an issuer's system of internal accounting controls is in compliance with the provisions of the act." This could be done by requiring management to state that it has a control system, along with an auditor's opinion on the matter.

In addition, the SEC already has pending rule proposals, predating the new law, that would make it unlawful for anyone to falsify corporate books and records and for any officer, director or shareholder of a public company to mislead an accountant in connection with an examination of a company's financial report.

The SEC moves are spurring related efforts within the accounting profession to devise more-comprehensive reports to shareholders on companies' internal control systems. The American Institute of Certified Public Accountants, a trade group, has a task force at work on developing guidelines for evaluating such systems—criteria that will be helpful in assuring compliance with the new law.

"It is virtually certain that reporting on internal controls will be a reality for public companies" soon, the SEC's Mr. Williams says. And in fact, some companies, including American Telephone & Telegraph Co., already provide such reports.

LAW'S PROVISIONS

Meanwhile, the law has gone into effect. It specifies that companies must have "internal accounting controls sufficient to provide reasonable assurances" that four goals will be met. These goals cover management authorization for use of a company's assets, accurate accounting for transactions, regular double-checking and remedial action when needed.

But the act is stirring much concern. The key problem analysts say, is that its accounting provisions are drawn from language used by accountants and clear enough for them but not clear enough for attorneys. "Many lawyers have pointed out that the language is far too imprecise to consititute legal standards," according to the auditing firm of Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co.

Touche Ross & Co., another major auditor, complains in a report to clients: "No government regulatory rules or guidelines on how the act should be applied have been issued. Unless general guidelines are developed, determining whether individuals and companies have complied with the act may have to wait until the provisions of the act are applied and interpreted in specific administrative and judicial proceedings of alleged wrongdoing. This could prove a long, tedious and painful process."

Under current practice, auditors normally study a client company's internal control system only to determine how much they can rely on it in auditing the books. They don't make a comprehensive study because it may be cheaper and quicker to check sample transactions and records to ascertain that the financial statements follow generally accepted accounting principals.

However, in making such tests, auditors may notice a weakness in the internal control system. If the weakness is considered "material"—significant enough to affect the overall report—the auditor comments on it in a confidential "management letter." The management then can correct it or, for various legitimate reasons, decide action isn't necessary.

Under the new law, this process is fraught with legal implications. What may seem "sufficient" or "reasonable" to an auditor may not seem so to a regulatory agency, analysts note. Moreover, as the Arthur Young study says, "Determining compliance with provisions of law ultimately involves legal determinations and interpretations. It isn't within an auditor's purview to give legal advice."

However, if an auditor reports to management, as required, a material weakness in acounting controls, that report becomes a letter in the company's files—a letter that would be damaging evidence of a violation of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. In addition, the law doesn't provide any "grace period" for correcting a possibly illegal weakness following its discovery.

CHECKING "RED FLAGS"

One possible outcome, Arthur Young warns, is a "Ping-Pong" effect. "We find a significant deficiency or weakness during an audit and tell the client about it. The client asks whether the condition is a violation of the law. We respond, 'Ask your lawyer,' and the counsel says, 'Ask your accountants.' "

Despite the uncertainties, some companies and their auditors are reviewing their internal control systems, especially focusing on certain types of transactions about which accountants have found it pays to ask questions. For example, typical "red flags" would be currency dealings, checks drawn to "cash," or checks payable to accounts of nonoperating entities in secretive countries. Others might be unusual bonuses paid to employes or unusual credits granted customers.

But the key to evaluating an internal control system, auditors say, is to check the entire cycle of various kinds of transactions—for example, following through all the procedures and signatures required to record a sales order, ship the goods and collect the payment. This kind of study can be useful even if it doesn't disclose any significant weaknesses, Coopers & Lybrand's Mr. Auerbach says.

Recently, he says, two internal auditors from Sun Co. and two Coopers people reviewed one transaction cycle at the oil company and found "a number of possible system improvements." Besides, the auditing team reported, several Sun employes actually stamping documents and signing papers said that, "for the first time, they had gained an understanding of how their jobs fitted into the system."

EFFORTS TO ERADICATE WORLD HUNGER UNDERSCORE SIMILAR NEED TO OUTLAW AND PUNISH GENOCIDE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, it has been some time now since we have heard about the tremendous problem of global hunger and malnutrition.

As the terrible drought in the so-called Sahel region of Africa subsided, so too did the sense of urgency about world hunger. But regrettably, the problem of global starvation remains severe. Last month, the United Nations World Food Council estimated that some 450 million people are seriously malnourished and said that the situation is getting worse. As the president of that body noted several weeks ago, the developed countries are in grave danger of being "lulled into a false sense of complacency."

In truth, the United States and other industrialized nations have made some efforts recently to combat global hunger. President Carter has established a presidential commission that will recommend administrative and legislative strategies to improve American responsiveness to world hunger, while stimulating a high level of industry and private voluntary agency involvement in tackling hunger problems.

At the same time, the President's mother, Mrs. Lillian Carter, is presently on a trip to four developing nations in Africa to focus American and world attention on issues of malnutrition and food production.

Mr. President, these efforts represent important steps toward reducing starvation and death that have become a way of life for many people around the world.

But as we strive to eliminate the unnecessary deaths of millions of our Earth's inhabitants, let us not be lulled into complacency about another source of human death—man's mass murder of his fellow man.

Tragically, genocide continues to rival those ravages of nature like flood or drought in its destructive effects. If we can initiate efforts to eradicate world hunger, we can do the same with genocide. One very simple, very important opportunity is available to us.

Mr. President, I am speaking about ratification of the Genocide Convention, an action that would commit this Nation to the definition and punishment of genocide under international law.

For nearly 30 years, this opportunity has stared us in the face, but we have neglected to act. In the context of President Carter's emphasis on human rights as an integral part of American foreign policy, our refusal to ratify the Genocide Convention has become a major source of diplomatic embarrassment.

Of course, ratification of the Genocide Convention will not end mass murder all at once, just as the establishment of a Presidential panel on hunger will not solve the problem of global starvation. Neither action is a panacea for injustice.

But in the same way that the Geneva Conventions for the Treatment of Prisoners of War have improved that situation, the Genocide Convention will represent a significant step toward civilizing the affairs of nations.

Let us work to safeguard the right to live. Let us endorse this important moral document without delay.

PROBLEMS OF U.S. URANIUM RESOURCES AND SUPPLY TO THE YEAR 2010

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, over the last few days an extremely interesting and extremely important report has become available. It is the report of the Uranium Resource Group of the Supply and Delivery Panel of the Committee On Nuclear and Alternative Energy Systems of the National Research Council, of course, under the National Academy of Sciences.

This is supporting paper 1 entitled "Problems of U.S. Uranium Resources and Supply to the Year 2010."

This distinguished panel has done what in this Senator's, and former geologist's, point of view is an excellent job of analyzing the problems dealt with in the report.

I would particularly call my colleagues' attention to its distinguished chairman, Dr. Leon T. Silver, professor of geology, division of geological and planetary sciences, California Institute of Technology. Dr. Silver's scientific reputation and his knowledge in this field are without peer.

Mr. President, I hope that my colleagues will have an opportunity to at least read the summary findings and recommendations of this report, which I will subsequently introduce into the RECORD.

We have heard a great deal on this floor and from members of the administration and in the media about the question of our dependency or potential dependency on nuclear energy in the future.

Well, whatever decision this country finally makes, there will be a need for nuclear fuel, and this report should be viewed as, if not sobering in its analysis then certainly, something we should take very close account of.

I would just read a few of the findings and recommendations, not all but a few of the most critical. Under the findings, No. 2 reads:

2. The best current estimate of U.S. uranium reserves contained in $30/lb forward cost ore* is 640,000 tons of $U_3O_8$. The actual reserves may be as low as 480,000 tons, but it probably is no higher than 640,000 tons.

Then No. 3 and 4:

3. The best current estimate of U.S. potential uranium resources is 1,060,000 tons of $U_3O_8$ in $30/lb ore.

4. The best current estimate of combined U.S. uranium reserves and potential resources is 1,760,000 tons of $U_3O_8$ in $30/lb ore.

Mr. President, to put those findings in their context, we have had estimates placed before this body and its committees suggesting that there are close to 4 million tons of uranium available to this country between now and early in the next century. Those estimates, according to this report, are obviously wrong, and we must view with alarm the status of this discrepancy.

I would also quote finding No. 12 of the panel's report which they italicized, and I would also, and underlined, which reads as follows:

12. In the opinion of the panel, current levels of exploration will not provide the discoveries required to meet the demand forecasts. To meet these requirements, a fivefold increase in the rates of discovery and development of reserves is necessary. Considering the increasing difficulty of finding major new deposits, this probably will necessitate a tenfold increase in exploration drilling.

Finally, Mr. President, I would quote from the report three of their recommendations or rather let me quote the first four recommendations.

1. Public expression of an immediate and firm commitment by the federal government for a program of growth of nuclear-generated electrical energy. It is not probable that long-term efforts and investments will be generated without such an announced commitment.

2. Expansion of the federally supported research and development program in the basic geology and geochemistry of uranium in support of exploration. New design, direction, participation, and an increased effort by order of magnitude would be required.

3. Expansion of the activities of ERDA and the U.S. Geological Survey in uranium appraisal, in the direction of basic research and technology development in a number of specific areas described in the body of the report, to provide better models and analytical techniques. External review systems to monitor and improve progress in resource appraisal should be created.

4. Creation of an explicit and attractive climate of incentives and regulations that would lead to a highly accelerated industry exploration program.

Mr. President, I personally view this report with alarm. I hope that my colleagues will read it, and I ask unanimous consent that this portion of the report, entitled "Supporting Paper 1," be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUPPORTING PAPER 1: PROBLEMS OF U.S. URANIUM RESOURCES AND SUPPLY TO THE YEAR 2010

PREFACE

In June 1975, the National Research Council (NRC) undertook a comprehensive study of the nation's prospective energy economy during the period 1985-2010, with special attention to the role of nuclear power among the alternative energy systems. The goal of the study is to assist the American people and government in formulating energy policy.

The Governing Board of the National Research Council appointed an NRC-wide Committee on Nuclear and Alternative Energy Systems (CONAES) to conduct the study. CONAES consists of 15 members drawn from diverse disciplines and backgrounds. The committee developed a three-tiered functional structure for the study. The first tier is CONAES itself. The ultimate findings, judgments, and conclusions of the study will be embodied in its final report.

To provide scientific and engineering data and analyses, a second tier of four panels was formed to examine (1) energy demand and conservation, (2) energy supply and delivery systems, (3) risks an impacts of energy supply and use, and (4) syntheses of diverse models of future energy economies, respectively. Each panel, in turn, established a number of resource groups—22 in all—as the third tier, to address in detail an array of more particular matters, such as buildings and transportation systems, solar energy, breeder reactors, coal technologies, health and environmental implications, and alternative consumption patterns and economic models. In all, more than 200 informed individuals served on or contributed to the work of the panels and resource groups.

The National Research Council customarily publishes only the final reports of its committees—and then only after the report has been reviewed by a group other than its authors according to procedures approved by a Report Review Committee consisting of members of the National Academy of Sciences, the National Academy of Engineering, and the Institute of Medicine. However, because such a large volume of information and analyses was assembled for consideration by the committee, and because of the diversity and scope of that information and the accompanying judgments, the panel reports and approximately 10 reports by the resource groups are being published as supporting papers. Each of these has been considered and used by CONAES but has not undergone the critical review procedure normal to the NRC. The report of the Uranium Resource Group has, however, been subjected to a thorough and expert peer review for accuracy, consistency, and clarity.

It must be recognized that some conclusions of the panel and resource group reports may be at variance with the conclusions of the CONAES report. The findings reported in these documents are those of their authors and are not necessarily endorsed by CONAES or the National Research Council.

The contents of this report cover the work of the Uranium Resource Group of the Supply and Delivery Panel, performed for the most part in 1976–1977. The report was designed to inform the panel and CONAES by responding to certain specific questions. Its scope reflects the nature of the assignment. This report, together with the other supporting papers, is published to enrich the understanding of the intricate and wide-ranging issues and implications of energy in the coming decades and to acquaint the reader with the variety and complexity of the material with which CONAES has had to deal.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

In preparing this report, the Uranium Resource Subpanel has drawn on interviews and contributions from representatives of industry, universities, and the government. The subpanel wishes to express its particular appreciation for the cooperation of E. Grutt and colleagues, Grand Junction Office, U.S. Energy Research and Development Administration, and W. Finch, Uranium and Thorium Resource Branch, U.S. Geological Survey, Denver, Colorado. S. Adams, Anaconda Co., and R. Luke, Kerr-McGee Corp., were early members of the subpanel who helped create the framework for the report and have served as a continuing resource. James Boyd, Chairman, Energy Resources Resource Group, CONAES, met with the subpanel for many of its meetings and contributed to its deliberations. David Tillman has provided essential support in the preparation of this report.

SUMMARY

The principal findings of the CONAES Uranium Resource Subpanel on the reserves, potential resources, and producibility of uranium and thorium for nuclear power generation in the United States to the year 2010 are presented below. The estimates that follow are derived from the best information available to the subpanel. The considerable uncertainties are discussed in the body of the report.

Brief definitions of resource terms used in the findings are as follows:

Reserves are discovered and defined uranium or thorium ore.

Potential Resources are undiscovered or inadequately defined concentrations of uranium or thorium that may become economically producible in the future.

FINDINGS

1. The information bases available for appraisal of domestic and world uranium and thorium resources are not adequate for precise quantitative assessment and statistical treatment.

2. The best current estimate of U.S. uranium reserves contained in $30/lb forward cost ore* is 640,000 tons of $U_3O_8$. The actual reserves may be as low as 480,000 tons, but it probably is no higher than 640,000 tons.

3. The best current estimate of U.S. potential uranium resources is 1,060,000 tons of $U_3O_8$ in $30/lb ore.

4. The best current estimate of combined U.S. uranium reserves and potential resources is 1,760,000 tons of $U_3O_8$ in $30/lb ore. (This includes an estimated 60,000 tons of by-product $U_3O_8$. The subpanel's subjective confidence in this value and in higher and lower estimates is as follows:

| Combined resources ($30/lb $U_3O_8$); | Probability (percent): |
|---|---|
| Less than 1,000,000 tons | 3 |
| Less than 1,760,000 tons | 33 |
| Less than 3,780,000 tons | 97 |

5. Adequate data are not available for assessing the abundance of U.S. $100/lb uranium potential resources. In the subpanel's opinion, the probability that the actual resource value is less than 3 million tons is 70 percent.

6. World uranium ($U_3O_8$) reserves at $30/lb, including those of the United States, are estimated at 2.4 million short tons.

*Forward cost is the estimate of capital and operating cost not yet incurred that will be required to produce a pound of $U_3O_8$ at the time the estimate is made. Forward costs per pound (in 1975 dollars) rather than market prices will be used in this report except where otherwise specified. For a forward cost of $30/lb, an approximate market price might be $40–$60/lb.

7. World uranium ($U_3O_8$) resources at $30/lb, including those of the United States, are estimated at 5.1 million short tons.

8. U.S. and world thorium resources have never been adequately appraised and no appraisals are in prospect. About 500,000 short tons of $ThO_2$ potential resources have been estimated in the United States and about 2,450,000 tons in the world, but cost figures are not available.

9. In a successful uranium exploration program, there is generally an 8- to 15-year interval from the start of exploration to the first production of ore.

10. 1976 exploration drilling is reported at 3.8 million feet. Costs are reported at $171 million, an all-time high.

11. Exploration yields per units of drilling and cost are expected to continue to decline over the long term. This will result from the need for deeper drilling and more intensive exploration of previously unproductive regions.

12. In the opinion of the panel, current levels of exploration will not provide the discoveries required to meet the demand forecasts. To meet these requirements, a fivefold increase in the rates of discovery and development of reserves is necessary. Considering the increasing difficulty of finding major new deposits, this probably will necessitate a tenfold increase in exploration drilling.

13. The possibilities for identifying additional unanticipated resources in the United States have not been exhausted, despite the increased difficulties and costs of exploration. These possibilities cannot be quantified at this time and they certainly cannot be utilized realistically in any prudent forecasts of uranium production for the next 25-35 years, given the time spans that intervene between exploration and production.

14. In resource appraisal, ERDA activities in estimating reserves are very useful. However, ERDA has not established an adequate base of information to permit effective estimation of potential resources.

15. The National Uranium Resource Evaluation (NURE) program will not make a contribution to U.S. uranium exploration and to resource appraisal commensurate with the need. Its design and funding are not adequate for supporting rapid growth in ore discovery rates and in the definition of new uranium provinces.

16. Domestic annual uranium production has been 12,000–13,000 tons of $U_3O_8$ for the past 5 years. It is estimated it will reach between 17,000 and 19,000 tons by 1980, and between 22,000 and 26,000 tons by 1985. This production will fall significantly short of ERDA forecasts of demand and production, and of ERDA's contracts for enrichment. The ERDA uranium demand forecast we have selected for comparison with supply is the Mid Case 1976, based on 0.25 percent tails, with no plutonium recycling, in light water reactors. This forecast reflects the seventh year of reduction in ERDA statements of requirements, and further demand reductions seem probable.

17. Major shortfalls in domestic uranium oxide production relative to ERDA 1976 projections of requirements are predicted to the year 2000 and beyond, if present conditions affecting the exploration industry continue.

18. Relative to the ERDA Mid Case 1976 requirement, the estimated cumulative shortfall will be about 20 percent (54,000 tons) in 1985, about 30 percent (153,000 tons) in 1990, and more than 40 percent in 2000 (565,000 tons) in the Present Conditions scenario (I).

19. A scenario (II) that projects Moderately Enhanced Conditions for the domestic uranium industry, and an improved research program in support of exploration, suggests that discovery rates might be increased, and the shortfalls might be reduced by approximately one-half over the same period.

20. A scenario (III) under a Full Commitment to Nuclear Energy Development projects a possible uranium discovery rate and a production rate that could eliminate about 90 percent of the otherwise expected shortfall by the year 2000.

21. The average forward cost per pound of $U_3O_8$ (in 1975 dollars) in the three scenarios is estimated at:

Scenario I, $17/lb.; Scenario II, $21/lb.; Scenario III, $21/lb.

The higher costs of II and III reflect lower grades of ore taken and more rapid exploitation.

22. Foreign exploration and foreign demand are growing at comparable rates. The United States will have to compete vigorously in order to obtain significant supplies of uranium abroad. It will have no particular exploration advantages in foreign competition unless it develops superior science and technology by a program of research at home.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Even the recently reduced forecasts of nuclear generating capacity cannot be supported without a significant long-term increase in the rate at which new uranium ore reserves are discovered. It appears that with the present reserves and foreseeable uranium production capability, major near-term shortfalls of uranium production relative to ERDA's anticipated requirements are inevitable. If a national policy decision is made to use nuclear-generated electric power as a major contribution to the total U.S. energy supply, then drastic changes will be required in the national uranium exploration effort

The subpanel offers a number of recommendations that, if adopted, might increase rates of discovery and development of reserves and provide a better definition of the national uranium resource base. If these or similar recommendations are not adopted, and if implementation is not begun promptly, the nation can anticipate only a limited contribution from Light Water Reactor (LWR) nuclear electric generating capacity to the national electrical energy requirements during the rest of this century.

If it is a national decision that LWR nuclear electric power be given a major energy role, the following recommended courses of action are offered:

1. Public expression of an immediate and firm commitment by the federal government for a program of growth of nuclear-generated electrical energy. It is not probable that long-term efforts and investments will be generated without such an announced commitment.

2. Expansion of the federally supported research and development program in the basic geology and geochemistry of uranium in support of exploration. New design, direction, participation, and an increased effort by an order of magnitude would be required.

3. Expansion of the activities of ERDA and the U.S. Geological Survey in uranium appraisal, in the direction of basic research and technology development in a number of specific areas described in the body of the report, to provide better models and analytical techniques. External review systems to monitor and improve progress in resource appraisal should be created.

4. Creation of an explicit and attractive climate of incentives and regulations that would lead to a highly accelerated industry exploration program.

5. Enhancement of the incentives to invest risk capital in uranium exploration. In the opinion of the subpanel, rapid progress in exploration will require large-scale initial funding at the level of at least $10 billion in tne next 10 years. This might be provided by electric utilities and their power consumers if the utilities were allowed to pass on the costs of exploration in their rate schedules.

6. Maintenance of existing tax incentives and of the freedom of the uranium market from excessive regulation. Encouragement of the petroleum industry and other industries that have demonstrated exploration expertise and the funds for the required front-end investments to participate in uranium exploration.

7. Assignment of the responsibilities for regulation of exploration and production by the uranium industry to one central agency that would assemble all pertinent analysis and advice expeditiously. Provision should be made for agency decision response time in months, not years.

8. Maintenance of warranted environmental constraints and restrictions on access to public lands, but with provisions for periodic review for continued justification. Mechanisms for consideration of exceptions in appropriate cases of unusual priority should be established.

9. Development for foreign supplies of uranium as a supplement to domestic supplies, but not to the point of dependency. The U.S. exploration industry should be encouraged by tax credits and fiscal policies to develop larger exploration program abroad, which can compete with other international efforts. Technical competence developed in this country should be made available through our participation in the International Atomic Energy Agency programs.

In concluding this section on recommendations, the subpenaed duly notes that a number of similar observations on resources and several similar recommendations were made in the 1975 NAS-NRC COMRATE supplementary report, "Reserves and Resources of Uranium in the United States." We have recognized no evidence of significant response in current and projected ERDA estimates and plans.

APPROPRIATIONS HIT ROCK BOTTOM

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) and Independent Agencies has completely removed the funding from the NASA budget for scientific investigation of Moon rocks and other extraterrestrial material. This unquestionably is a hasty and ill-advised budget reduction. Hopefully, the full Appropriations Committee will reverse the subcommittee's action and restore the $5.7 million funding for NASA to continue this important and historic scientific program.

Clearly, NASA is and should be the lead agency for scientific investigation of lunar and extraterrestrial material. These samples are collected in a space environment by NASA, transported and distributed by NASA, and information derived from the scientific investigations of this material is used in part to plan future NASA probes to planets, asteroids and comets.

An article from the Washington Post of July 27, 1978, by Bob Levey entitled "Unlocking the Moon's Secrets: Unfinished Business," ably points out some of the reasons that funding for this program should be continued. Mr. President, we have spent approximately $25.6 billion on the six successful Moon landing missions. Now are we saying that the $5.7 million requested for this fiscal year, 0.02375 of 1 percent, roughly two-hundredths of 1 percent, is too much to invest to learn more of the scientific secrets resulting from these missions? If so, it would be an incredibly unbelievable situation even in this budget-cuttting year. Historians will be incredulous at such an action.

The lunar samples are a unique national and international treasure, unlike any scientific material ever studied. It is appropriate that the study of the samples be funded in a unique and now well-understood manner. International interchanges stimulated by this sample research have been of great and continuing value to the country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the Post article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNLOCKING THE MOON'S SECRETS: UNFINISHED BUSINESS

Two twirls left, two more right, and the lock on the gray filing cabinet drawer clicks open. Edwin Roedder reaches inside with exaggerated care, as if he were about to pat a newborn in a crib. Grinning, he steps aside so a visitor can see.

Holy Neil Armstrong! Great intergalactic Captain Video! The drawer is lousy with moon rocks.

Gray ones and brown ones, rust-colored ones and blackish ones. Here a moon rock nugget, mounted in a plastic case. There a collection of moon pebbles, sealed in a plastic bag. A few slides of moon dust. Some envelopes full of shavings. All brought to you direct from outer space.

Those expecting speckles and sparkles would be disappointed by moon rocks. They are dull to the eye and the touch. Kick them down a country road, and you couldn't tell them from earth rocks. And if anyone still harbors illusions about green cheese—go back two spaces and forfeit your turn.

But lifeless as the moon rocks seem, they generate a jolt of fascination.

All those astronauts, all those missions, all those hours in front of the television. One tends to start composing a speech for one's grandchildren: "Sure, sure, your old granddad remembers Neil Armstrong. And he also remembers the day he tossed moon rocks around like hardboiled eggs. Remembers it like yesterday. . . ."

But moon rocks are anything but fantasy to Ed Roedder. They are the opportunity of a lifetime.

As a geologist at U.S. Geological Survey headquarters in Reston, Roedder heads one of 96 scientific teams conducting federally sponsored research in the U.S. on lunar samples brought home by Apollo missions 11, 12 and 17.

For nine years, or almost from the instant Armstrong splashed down in the Pacific with his two companions and 830 pounds of moon rocks, scientists have been examining the booty.

They have learned a lot. They know, for example, that the moon was not created in anything like the way the earth was, for moon rocks do not contain certain minerals found on earth. They know that human life cannot be independently supported on the moon's surface, for moon rocks do not contain water or oxygen. And they have been able to deduce a great deal about the way meteors have affected the moon's surface.

But as Ed Roedder says. "There are many things still to be learned from the lunar samples. Some of the rocks haven't been studied at all.

"Curiosity is just one side of it. We have to keep studying these rocks so we can learn about the earth, not just the moon."

The trouble is that mice on Capitol Hill are nibbling at the moon rock research budget.

From grants totaling more than $10 million in fiscal year 1970, the lunar sample research budget of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration has steadily dwindled.

In the current fiscal year, it is $5.7 million. Last year, it was $5.9 million. Next year, NASA is asking again for $5.7 million—but inflation makes that equivalent to a cut in funds.

Meanwhile, the number of projects is declining, too. This year there are 96 projects; as recently as fiscal year 1975 there were 126. And it is not a matter of lack of demand. "I know lots of people who applied for grants and have been turned down," said Roedder.

What of the fact that $24 billion was spent on the three Apollo missions? What about ongoing, multiyear research that might have to be abandoned in midstream? Isn't there other fat in the federal budget?

"Well," said a Senate source, "you've heard of cutting off your nose to spite your face, haven't you?"

According to one high-ranking staff member for the House Committee on Science and Technology, the danger of the floor falling out of federal moon research funds is very small. Rather, the staffer said, his fear is the funds will continue to be chipped away, robbing some research projects of the scope and tools they should have.

"For the first time this year, I have been hearing from ranking members of committees that, hey, isn't nine years long enough on these rocks? How can there be anything left to look at?" the staff members said.

"In the past, there was concern only about duplication of research efforts, Moon rocks were very sexy then. Now, they're starting to become just another item in the budget."

The staff member said he finds such an attitude "almost foolhardy. We spend all these dollars to get there, and now we're talking about not getting everything we can out of it. We should do whatever we can with the samples. Everything."

For Ed Roedder, it is not as if he is facing the business end of a loaded gun. He has nine projects that do not involve moon rocks at all. He would not be standing in a breadline if his grant were not renewed.

Still, the question visibly saddened him. Asked what he would do if Moon-rock money were to vanish, Roedder clasped his hands and looked at the floor for 10 seconds.

"Well, I guess I'd just have to turn in my samples and go back to terrestrial samples," he said. Then, gazing at the Virginia countryside outside his laboratory window, he added: "But I wouldn't like it. Not one bit."

CONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN MEASURES ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, these two measures having been cleared on the other side of the aisle, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar Orders Nos. 959 and 960.

Mr. SCHMITT. No objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STANDING BEAR LAKE

The bill (S. 3342) to name a lake which has been completed as part of the Papillion Creek basin project as the "Standing Bear Lake," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the lake known as the Military Lake, which has been completed on site 16 (as described in House Document Numbered 349, Ninetieth Congress) of such Papillion Creek basin project, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Standing Bear Lake". Any reference in any law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States shall be held to be a reference to the Standing Bear Lake.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. SCHMITT. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–1037), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPT

PURPOSE

The purpose of S. 3342, as reported, is to authorize the naming of Military Lake in the Papillion Creek project in Nebraska as "Standing Bear Lake."

GENERAL STATEMENT

Standing Bear was a chief of the Poncas. He is of great historic and symbolic importance to Indian people. He is also to be remembered and celebrated as an individual who believed in the cause of freedom.

In 1877 the Ponca Tribe was relocated to Indian Territory by the Federal Government. This move resulted in suffering and death. In 1879 Chief Standing Bear, in violation of Government orders, returned to Nebraska to bury his son. For this he was arrested and tried. At his trial the judge declared for the first time that an Indian was a person within the naming of the law and thus a citizenship reference for our native Americans was first made.

This trial and its attendant publicity prompted President Rutherford B. Hayes to rule that the Poncas should be entitled to return to their lands along the Niobrara River. The site of this famous trial was Fort Omaha which is only a few miles from the damsite which is proposed for naming by this bill.

Chief Standing Bear's courage served to substantiate the basic rights of Americans in this country.

CHET HOLIFIELD BUILDING

The bill (H.R. 12138) to name a certain Federal building in Laguna Niguel, Calif., the "Chet Holifield Building," was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. SCHMITT. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–1038), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPT

PURPOSE OF THE LEGISLATION

The purpose of H.R. 12138, as reported, is to authorize the naming of the Federal Building at Laguna Niguel, Calif., the "Chet Holifield Building."

GENERAL STATEMENT

Congressman Chet Holifield was born in Mayfield, Ky., on December 3, 1903. He was educated in the public schools of Arkansas and has resided in Montebello, Calif., since 1920. For many decades, he has served his community, his State, and his country with high distinction and dedicated service.

Chet Holifield was elected to Congress in 1942 as the first representative from the newly reapportioned 19th Congressional District of California and was reelected to 14 succeeding terms of Congress. He distinguished himself as a conscientious legislator and valuable congressional leader. He served as chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy in the 87th, 89th and 91st Congresses and as vice chairman of the Joint Committee in the 88th and 90th Congresses.

Over many years the Congressman was instrumental in the development of the atom in the military and in the transitional use of atomic energy from the military to the commercial sector.

In recognition of Chet Holifield's outstanding expertise, he was appointed as congressional adviser or delegate to numerous commissions and international conferences. He was the representative of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy at the first organizational meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, Austria in 1957, and he served as congressional adviser to the U.S. delegations to the 3d, 7th, 9th, 12th, 13th and 14th General Conferences of the International Atomic Energy Agency between 1959 and 1970.

Chet Holifield devoted much of his illustrious career to pursuing the peaceful uses of atomic energy. He was congressional adviser to the U.S. delegations to the International Conferences on the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy in Geneva, Switzerland, in 1955 and 1971; to the Conference on the Discontinuance of Nuclear Weapons Tests at Geneva in 1959 and 1961; and to the Disarmament Conferences at Geneva from 1967 through 1971.

Chet Holifield also devoted much of his talents to improving Government. During his tenure in Congress he served as chairman of the House Committee on Government Operations and as chairman of the Subcommittee on Legislation and Military Operations, House Committee on Government Operations. He examined the creation of more departments and more reorganizations than perhaps any other person in the Congress. In addition, he was vice-chairman of the Commission on Government Procurement from 1970 through 1972, and served as a member of the Commission on Organization of the executive branch of Government.

The Congressman's distinguished career has been recognized and noted by his constituents and the people of his country. He is the recipient of numerous awards, including the Congressional Distinguished Service Award of the American Political Science Association and the National Security Award of the U.S. Civil Defense Council. He holds a number of honorary degrees from distinguished American colleges.

It is in further recognition of Chet Holifield's long and distinguished career, and in view of his outstanding service to the people of his district and to his country that the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works reports the bill to name, in his honor, the Federal building at Laguna Niguel, Calif., the "Chet Holifield Building."

SURFACE MINING CONTROL AND RECLAMATION ACT

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 2463.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the bill from the Senate (S. 2463) entitled "An Act to amend the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977 (Public Law 95–87) to raise certain authorized funding levels contained therein, and for other purposes", do pass with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert: That section 712 of the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977 (Public Law 95–87, 91 Stat. 445, 524) is hereby amended as follows:

(1) in subsection (a), delete all after "September 30, 1978," and insert in lieu thereof: "$25,000,000 for each of the two succeeding fiscal years, and in such fiscal years such additional amounts as may be necessary for increases in salary, pay, retirement, other employee benefits authorized by law, and other nondiscretionary costs."; and

(2) delete subsection (b) and insert in lieu thereof: "(b) For the implementation and funding of section 507(c) there are authorized to be appropriated sums reserved by section 401(b)(1) for the purposes of section 507(c) and such additional sums as may be necessary (i) for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978, to provide an amount not to exceed $10,000,000 to carry out the purposes of section 507(c) and (ii) for the fiscal years ending September 30, 1979, and September 30, 1980, to provide an amount not to exceed $25,000,000 to carry out the purposes of section 507(c)."

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session to consider a nomination at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be stated.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

The assistant legislative clerk read the following nomination, reported earlier in the day by the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Talcott W. Seelye, of Maryland, to be Ambassador to the Syrian Arab Republic.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. SCHMITT. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senate will convene at the hour of 10 o'clock Monday morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is still in executive session.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATORS CURTIS AND BAKER ON MONDAY

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, after the two leaders have been recognized under the standing order, the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS) and the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER) be recognized, each for not to exceed 15 minutes, after which the Senate resume the consideration of the International Monetary Fund bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I shall now state the program for Monday.

The Senate will come in at 10 o'clock on Monday.

After the two leaders or their designees have been recognized under the standing order, the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS) will be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes and the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER) will be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes, after which the Senate will resume its consideration of the International Monetary Fund bill.

Rollcall votes will occur on amendments or motions in relation to the bill. Hopefully final action will be reached on that bill on Monday. In any event, there will be no rollcall votes, however, before 3 o'clock p.m., with the possible exception of rollcall votes which deal with procedural matters, such as establishing the presence of a quorum. I would anticipate several rollcall votes on Monday after 3 o'clock p.m.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. ON MONDAY

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 10 o'clock on Monday morning next.

The motion was agreed to; and at 5:37 p.m., the Senate recessed until Monday, July 31, 1978, at 10 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate July 28, 1978.

CONFIRMATION

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate July 28, 1978:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Talcott W. Seelye, of Maryland, a Foreign Service officer of class 1, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Syrian Arab Republic.

The above nomination was approved subject to the nominee's commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO DEBATE

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an exchange of "Dear Colleague" letters on the issue of whether or not the arms embargo against Turkey is required as a matter of law.

Following are letters from the proponents of keeping the arms embargo against Turkey in which it is contended that the embargo is required as a matter of law and continues to be required. In a second letter, I have tried to counter this argument and state why the embargo is not required by law, but rather the issue before the Congress is a policy issue, not a legal issue and it is up to the Congress to decide whether the embargo continues to be appropriate.

The two letters follow:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July, 1978.

THE EMBARGO AND THE LAW

DEAR COLLEAGUE: You will soon have an opportunity to cast a vote in favor of a foreign policy based on principle and in accord with rule of law.

The Carter Administration's proposal to remove the limited arms embargo now in effect against Turkey is, in our view an ill-conceived move that violates fundamental legal, moral and security principles of U.S. foreign policy. We ask your help in defeating this effort, and we hope to set forth, in this and subsequent letters, the considerations which have led us to our position on this important matter.

The Turkish arms embargo is required as a matter of law.

It is important to remember that the arms embargo was voted by Congress only after Turkey, in clear violation of American laws and bilateral agreements already in effect, used American weapons for offensive purposes in its second—August, 1974—invasion and occupation of Cyprus.

Unlike Turkey's Cyprus action of the previous month, which was mounted in response to a coup instigated on the island by the Greek junta, this August invasion took place at a time when hostilities had ended, the junta had fallen, a ceasefire was in effect and the interested parties were engaged in peace talks at Geneva. It was at that moment that Turkey employed 40,000 troops, armed with American weapons, to occupy forty percent of Cyprus, and it was in response to this second, clearly offensive, operation, that Congress acted.

Provisions of both the Foreign Assistance Act and the Foreign Military Sales Act required that further military aid to Turkey be terminated. The embargo was voted, therefore, not to enact new law but rather to insure that existing laws were enforced.

Secretary of State Vance has conceded in his recent testimony before the House International Relations Committee that the Turkish occupation of Cyprus was carried out in violation of American laws and bilateral agreements. He has conceded, further, that the imposition of the embargo was the appropriate response to those violations.

Precisely the same considerations which justified imposition of the embargo now require its continued support.

Nearly four years after its invasion of Cyprus, Turkey still occupies forty percent of the island. Nearly 30,000 troops of that occupying army, still equipped with American weapons, remain there. And Turkey has taken no actions to improve the situation substantially.

The continued presence of these Turkish troops of Cyprus, therefore, constitutes nothing less than a continuing violation of American laws. So long as the violations continue, the embargo must remain in force.

It should be noted that the embargo provision itself permits President Carter to end the embargo in a moment, if he is willing to certify to Congress that Turkey is now in compliance with the Foreign Assistance Act, the Foreign Military Sales Act, and its bilateral agreements with the United States, and that substantial progress has been made toward an agreement regarding military forces on Cyprus. We would welcome actions by Turkey substantive enough to permit President Carter to make such certifications to Congress; clearly, however, Turkey has taken no such actions.

In his policy statements on this very issue during his campaign for the Presidency, Jimmy Carter declared that "The United States must pursue a foreign policy based in principle and in accord with the rule of law." We ask that you join us in supporting those sentiments by voting to maintain the arms embargo against Turkey.

Sincerely,

Dante B. Fascell, John Brademas, Norman Y. Mineta, James J. Blanchard, Mario Biaggi, Edward J. Derwinski, Charles Rose, Paul E. Tsongas, Barbara A. Mikulski, George M. O'Brien, Benjamin S. Rosenthal, Parren J. Mitchell, Donald M. Fraser, Benjamin A. Gilman, John L. Burton, Robert W. Edgar, Norman E. D'Amours, Wyche Fowler, Jr., Martin A. Russo, James J. Florio, and Charles B. Rangel.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 26, 1978.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: In the last few days, the proponents of keeping an arms embargo on Turkey have circulated letters giving reasons why the embargo against Turkey should be maintained.

In this and subsequent letters I seek to give you another perspective on this issue and to counter arguments made by the proponents of the embargo.

Arguments used by proponents of keeping the arms embargo against Turkey:

1. The Turkish arms embargo is required as a matter of law.

2. Precisely the same considerations which justified imposition of the embargo now require its continued support.

Counter:

1. This issue before Congress is a policy issue, not a legal issue.

Whether the embargo should be required by law is the question at issue. Congress should decide, as a matter of national policy, whether the embargo continues to be appropriate.

Although the embargo is currently required as a matter of law by section 620(x) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, the Congress is in the process of deciding whether that section should be repealed. Surely, the proponents of the embargo are not arguing that Congress is powerless to lift the embargo. If the Congress enacts legislation repealing section 620(x), the Turkish arms embargo will no longer be required as a matter of law.

2. Other provisions of law do not require the Turkish arms embargo.

Section 3(c) of the Arms Export Control Act and section 505(d) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, relating to ineligibility for assistance, are general in nature and do not supercede any specific action that the Congress may take with respect to shipments of U.S. arms to Turkey.

To argue that they do is to argue that the partial lifting of the embargo which the Congress enacted in 1975, revised in 1976, and extended in 1977, is illegal.

Those provisions were extensively revised in 1976 and do not apply to violations occurring before then. Moreover, by the terms of those revised sections, a country does not become ineligible to receive U.S. arms and assistance unless and until either (1) the President determines that a substantial violation of the terms of a military assistance or sales agreement has occurred and reports that determination to Congress, or (2) the Congress adopts a joint resolution stating that it finds that a country is ineligible because a substantial violation has occurred. Neither action has occurred in the Turkish case. These provisions of law are not self-enforcing.

3. The principle of law has been upheld.

The enactment of the embargo demonstrated that U.S. arms cannot be used in an unauthorized way. That point will be no clearer if the embargo is left in effect. Our purpose is to get Turkish troops off Cyprus and get a settlement of the Cyprus dispute, but the present approach is not achieving these goals.

4. The principle of law will not be strengthened by leaving the embargo in effect indefinitely.

It defies common sense to contend that laws should remain in force when they harm the national interest. Nothing requires the imposition of an embargo for an indefinite duration as the only permissible response to a violation of the law.

5. Selective enforcement undermines the principle of law.

The proponents of keeping the embargo have shown no interest in applying the law in other cases where recipients of American arms may have violated agreements with the United States on the prescribed uses of US-supplied equipment. The Library of Congress lists over twenty cases since the 1950s when foreign states may have violated bilateral agreements with the United States. Turkey is the only country against which Congress has applied these sanctions.

6. From its viewpoint, Turkey sees the legal issues differently.

Since Cyprus' independence in 1960, both Turkey and Greece have sent US-origin equipment there illegally. Yet, Turkey was punished in 1974. From its perspective, Turkey felt it had conflicting legal responsibilities. On the one hand Turkey was responsible to our bilateral agreements and, on the other hand, Turkey felt it had a responsibility under the 1960 Accords on Cyprus (Article 4 of the 1960 Treaty of Guarantee) which gave Turkey the right to intervene to restore "the state of affairs" created by the Accords. Some appreciation should be shown for Turkey's legal and policy dilemma.

In sum, the Turkish arms embargo is not required as a matter of law. Whether there is an embargo on arms shipments to Turkey is a matter of policy to be decided by the Congress. In my view, United States interests are suffering in the region, the embargo has become self-defeating and a new approach is needed to try to achieve a Cyprus settlement and accelerate the withdrawals of remaining Turkish troops from the land.

I hope you will agree that it is in our national interest to lift the embargo against Turkey.

Sincerely yours,

LEE H. HAMILTON,

SOVIET TRIALS OF DISSIDENTS

HON. AUSTIN J. MURPHY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. MURPHY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the recent trials of dissidents in the Soviet Union has rightfully brought about worldwide criticism. The distinct lack of due process by Soviet courts demonstrates a disregard of basic rights accorded to defendants. The predetermined verdicts in the trials of Anatoly Scharansky, Aleksandr Ginzburg, and Viktoras Petkus are not representative of a freely conducted procedure.

In the Scharansky trial, courtroom observers were handpicked by Soviet officials thereby excluding the defendant's mother, the remainder of his family except her brother, and close friends from the trial. While supporters held vigil outside the building, Soviet officials photographed the crowd. Similar occurrences took place during the May trial of Yuri Orlov and also during the trial of Ginzburg. Actions such as these preclude any hope of a free and open trial.

In the conduct of the trials, basic rules of evidence were violated. In Scharansky's trial, flaws in the Soviet Government's case are readily apparent. For example, although the government charged that Scharansky telephoned Los Angeles Times correspondent Robert Toth to arrange a clandestine meeting, a government witness testified that there was no telephone in Scharansky's apartment. Such an instance points to a distinct lack of due process as well as a disregard for any rules of evidence.

The sentences given to Scharansky, Ginzburg, and Petkus are harsh by any standard. Ginzburg and Petkus have already spent years in prison because of their political views. For simply observing and acting upon violations of basic human rights, these individuals have had their rights abridged by a regime that seems insensitive to world opinion.

The Soviet Government has violated basic human rights in these cases. Freedom of expression and speech has been denied. Freedom of travel by refusing to allow Scharansky and others to emigrate has also been abridged. Such is the case of Vladimir Slepak who is now sentenced with a crime against the state because he publicly stated his desire to emigrate on a banner hung from his apartment. Throughout the course of these trials and the events surrounding them, the Soviet Government has consistently violated the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the United Nations Charter, and the Final Act of Helsinki accords. Such violations cannot go unnoticed in the court of world opinion. I, therefore, urge the continuance of worldwide focus on violations by the Soviet Union of some of its citizens' human and equal rights.●

ELK HILLS NAVAL PETROLEUM RESERVE

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, in the next few weeks the Congress will be asked to decide whether or not to reduce the rate of continued production at our Naval petroleum reserves. The principal reserve affected is in my State, Elk Hills NPR No. 1 near Bakersfield, Calif.

While the question that will be before the Congress will be simply stated, the implications of our decision will have a dramatic effect on the independent sector of the California oil industry.

A perceptive and compelling analysis of the reasons why Congress decided initially to develop Elk Hills and our Naval petroleum reserves, why we should continue to do so, and why the California oil industry is unique, might be helpful to my colleagues. I commend to you this analysis by Charles Seeger, an attorney with the Washington office of Nelson, Harding, & Yeutter and former legislative assistant to my friend the late Congressman Charles Teague. The analysis follows:

ELK HILLS NAVAL PETROLEUM RESERVE: PAST AND FUTURE

(By Charles M. Seeger)

During the House Armed Services Committee hearings on the Naval Petroleum Reserves a few weeks ago, a California Congressman traditionally aligned with Navy concerns asked the Department of Energy and Navy witnesses, "How much Elk Hills crude does the Navy get?"

"Not a barrel" was the essence of the dramatic reply. Unfortunately, the reply should have also added this fact: crude oil is virtually useless to the military. Refined product—such as Navy Special fuel, diesel fuel, jet fuel (JP–4 and JP–5), gasoline, asphalt—all these refined products are valuable to the military.[1]

This colloquy illustrates that one of the few positive government actions resulting from the 1973–74 Arab embargo is now in jeopardy.

In the next few weeks Congress will decide whether or not to reduce the rate of continued production from Elk Hills Naval Petroleum Reserve, and other reserves. This article argues that (1) continued production at the current maximum efficient at Elk Hills is the soundest course; (2) government policy is detrimental to the California producers effort to receive the proper value for his crude production; and (3) these two issues are only tangentially related and the oil policy of California requires special federal attention.

WHY ELK HILLS WAS OPENED

The oil embargo of 1973–74 forced the United States to examine its domestic production capability. Part of that examination included a look at Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 1, Elk Hills, in Kern County, California 35 miles west of Bakersfield. A reserve established in 1912 because of Teddy Roosevelt's concern for assuring a secure source of oil supply for the Navy. When the oil embargo occurred, Elk Hills had virtually no production only 2,500 barrels per day were being produced for testing and conservation, and this was the average daily production since World War II. Despite TR's hope, Elk Hills then provided the military no cushion of reliance. In December 1973, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, Admiral Moorer confirmed this and agreed that Elk Hills should be developed.

ELK HILLS PRODUCTION CAPABILITY

With due Congressional deliberance, and much urging by the local Congressman, the late William Ketchum, the Naval Petroleum Reserves Production Act of 1976 was enacted mandating production at the maximum efficient rate for six years.[2]

This law began considerable development work and Elk Hills production capability is now approximately 128,000 b/d. Elk Hills crude is above 23° API gravity, with the preponderance of the crude being approximately 36° gravity—the combination of Shallow Zone and Stevens Zone production is basically a higher quality crude. In the very near future, the production capability of Elk Hills should be about 140,000 b/d because of additional gas processing capability.

Navy and DOE estimates for ultimate maximum efficient rate are 260,000 b/d.

MILITARY IMPORTANCE OF ELK HILLS CONTINUED PRODUCTION

The Navy's interest is properly keen for historical reasons. But as already noted, the Navy's needs are for refined product and a readily available supply for emergencies. This need is met by continued production from Elk Hills. As noted, seven military bases are now receiving refined product from the independent refiners processing Elk Hills crude. Additionally, the Norwalk Fuel Support point, another recipient of refined product from Elk Hills crude, distributes product to 22 other Navy, Marine Corps, Army, and Air Force installations throughout California and Arizona. Admiral Moorer's comments favoring the production at Elk Hills since the beginning supports this perspective.

The military need for refined product deserves emphasis. This is so because of the discussion in the Armed Services Committee about the use of Elk Hills as a strategic petroleum reserve.

WHY NOT ELK HILLS AS A STRATEGIC PETROLEUM RESERVE?

There is a vast difference between crude oil already extracted from the ground and then placed in storage in a strategic petroleum reserve (SPR), and crude oil remaining to be extracted from a natural reservoir. The ultimate objective of the SPR (i.e., crude stored in salt domes on the Gulf Coast) is a draw down capability of 6 million barrels per day. The draw down can begin within 7 days. This tremendous accessibility is a totally different engineering proposition than extracting crude from a reservoir.

Elk Hills' maximum production level would still be less than one-fifth of the strategic petroleum reserve draw down. That one-fifth (260,000 b/d) could only be achieved through a diligent effort on the part of the Navy and DOE is readying Elk Hills so that it may be at its MER of production as called for under the original NPR Production Act.

If Elk Hills were fully developed, then shut-in as the current amendment of Congressman Bob Wilson (R-San Diego) requires, it would take at least three months to return production to the MER. This assumes that the deterioration of idle equipment does not totally preclude ever again regaining full production.

Unlike oil stored in salt domes, Elk Hills must be a fully-producing reserve if it is to be truly valuable as a reserve.

In short, refined product and the important local refinery capability is an important part of the military aspect of the Elk Hills reserve. Continued production at the MER is the most logical method of meeting our best national interest.

HOW DID THE SAN JOAQUIN VALLEY SMALL REFINERS OPERATE BEFORE ELK HILLS OPENED UP?

The song refrain, "Got along without ya before I met ya. . . ." raises an issue that must be addressed: Local small refiners, got along without Elk Hills crude three years ago, why do they need it so much now?

Before Elk Hills, local refineries were operating at approximately only 75 percent of capacity. Because of Elk Hills, these refineries are now able to utilize close to 100 percent of their capacity.

Additionally, the situation for small refiners in the San Joaquin Valley has changed since Elk Hills crude has become available.

1. Before, more light low-sulphur crude was produced locally and available. Now, overall, light crude production in the San Joaquin Valley has declined since early 1974, even with significant increases in production at such fields as Yowlumne, which has increased output from 239 b/d to 25,000 b/d in four years time.

2. Before, foreign light crude was trucked from Los Angeles and Long Beach Harbors at great expense. Elk Hills eliminates this extraordinary supply method.

3. Before, there was a greater market for the fuel oils refined from the heavier California crudes. Increasingly, more stringent environment regulations in California—the toughest in the nation—have greatly reduced the market for the high sulphur resid, the principal product of heavy California crude. This necessitates refiners running higher quality low-sulphur crude such as imported or Elk Hills.

Footnotes at end of article.

There is absolutely no question that the San Joaquin Valley refiners must have Elk Hills crude in order to run at efficient rates and meet the aforementioned changing supply and environmental concerns.

WHAT ABOUT CALIFORNIA PRODUCERS MARKETING PROBLEMS AND SHUT-INS

California crude producers clearly have severe problems with marketing their crude. The problem is marketing a 13° API crude with tar-like viscosity to refiners that, except for specialty refiners, would prefer to run a 36° API crude wtih a viscosity close to gasoline. This problem is compounded by the federal government. There are prohibitions on the exchange or direct export of heavy crude despite the fact that there is tremendous economic sense in doing this. And despite the fact certain California heavy crudes are shut-in while a ready market exists in Japan.

California producers efforts to receive a greater value for their crude, much of which is now priced considerably below ceiling prices, is further compounded by many DOE and Department of Commerce restraints on the export of heavy refined products from the California crude to potential markets, such as the east coast resid market or Japan.

As if the California producers problems were not complicated enough, there is the entitlements program—easily the most complex cost controlling scheme ever devised. This program was purportedly designed to equalize the cost of oil for all U S. refineries to prevent companies with ready access to lower tier domestic crude from driving other refineries out of business. The effect of this program in California is to offer virtually no incentive for West Coast refiners to run California heavy crudes when they can purchase higher quality crude from Alaska, Saudi Arabia, or Indonesia and off-set their higher crude costs through checks from other refiners in the entitlements program.

After years of dallying, the administration has within the past few weeks finally announced a program with a sliding scale gravity adjustment for the previously "crude-quality-blind" entitlements program. But, as the producers know, it remains to be seen what benefits they will receive.

Producers are also raising a question about the entitlement treatment Elk Hills crude now receives. Elk Hills crude is treated as uncontrolled oil for purposes of the entitlements program, thus it does not carry the entitlement burden of lower and upper tier crudes. No checks beyond the purchase price flow from the refiner. Arguably this entitlement free status disadvantages the California producer of entitlement burdened crude. But the reason is simple—the Congress wanted the government to receive as much money as possible for the government owned crude. Thus, Elk Hills is bid for on as near as is possible a free market basis. Whether or not this pricing decision for Elk Hills crude is changed should not be a part of the decision on the rate of production.

WEST COAST IS UNIQUE

One lesson from past regulatory tinkering with West Coast supply and demand facts should be to acknowledge that California is different. A program based on national crude acquisition averages is not particularly logical to refiners and producers operating in a petroleum industry with crude supply and product demand patterns quite different from the rest of the country.

In short, the oil policy of California deserves special federal attention. Senator Cranston and Congressman Mark Hannaford have always known this and their efforts in cajoling the administration have been admirable. Additionally, California producers and refiners alike have repeatedly called for incentives for refinery retro-fitting, to allow the necessary modernization and configuration changes to process heavier domestic crudes. The least incentive being a "stable, rational, and predictable government policy," in the words of California State Controller Ken Cory.

The important point regarding Elk Hills crude is that it is only tangentially related to California producers real problems.

Only tangentially related because "a barrel of crude is not a barrel of crude", that is, crude oil is not a fungible product. A comparison of Elk Hills Stevens zone with California Kern River or even Alaskan Sadlerochit is compelling. The gravity of Stevens zone is well over twice that of Kern River crude, and the sulphur content of the Stevens is only half as much.[3]

These significant quality differences between Elk Hills crude and the rest of the California production really do diminish the arguments that one crude displaces the other. The natural replacement for Elk Hills crude is like quality crude, and that unfortunately does not mean domestic crude.

WEST COAST GLUT?

The current "crude glut" in California must thus be viewed in quality terms. Further the "glut" also only exists because of California's failure to allow the Sohio project to carry the North Slope crude to the mid-continent, an approval very much wanted by Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.), of the House Energy and Power Subcommittee. And Dingell wants it before he works to provide the necessary review and alterations of DOE programs to benefit California producers.

Reduced production from Elk Hills would not alleviate the current California crude surplus. As the quality comparison illustrates, such a move would probably simply further increase the demand for foreign sweet crude. And while the surplus is real, it is a surplus of high sulphur crude principally brought on by the availability of Alaskan North Slope Crude. But this Alaskan heavier crude is 1) not accessible to the San Joaquin Valley refiners; 2) cannot be run efficiently in these refineries, and; 3) results in a product yield, which because of the high content of the residual boiler fuel, runs counter to prevailing market and environmental conditions because of state and local air pollution control standards that discourage the burning of residual oil and prohibits the burning of even minimumly high sulphur resid.

REVENUE LOSS AND BUDGET IMPACT

No review of the Elk Hills situation is complete without a recognition of its balance of payments benefit and income generating power through the bidding and sale process. Assuming an imported crude price of $15, oil revenues lost by withholding NPR crude from the commercial market would result in a loss of $500 million in fiscal year 1979 and each year thereafter through 1982.

CONCLUSION

In short, the reasoning behind getting our Naval Petroleum Reserves in ready production status was sound militarily, strategically, and economically. Elk Hills has benefited the Navy, our balance of payments deficit, the local refiners, and the California consumer. It's continued production is wise, and this is not debated. The rate of that production is now in question in Congress. At the very least no backward steps are warranted and would be disastrous to local small refiners. Producers legitimately raise many questions about their problems and these must be addressed. The full assessment on these concerns has been diligently sought by the California producers and must continue. The debate on the Wilson amendment to the Elk Hills authorization bill is not the forum for the necessary intricate review.

Six months ago President Carter instructed the Department of Energy to pursue efforts to "expand production of oil at the Elk Hills Naval Petroleum Reserve, and maintain production of California crude at a high level."[4] These two objectives are worthy and should be achieved.

FOOTNOTES

[1] Significantly, California's small refiners now processing Elk Hills crude are providing refined product to seven military facilities: Edwards Air Force Base; China Lake Naval Weapons Center; Point Mugu Naval Air Station; Ontario International Airport (Air Force fuel contract); Long Beach Naval Shipyard; San Pedro Defense Fuel Support Point; and Le Moore Naval Air Station.

[2] The law also allows three year production extensions if the President so recommends, and neither House of Congress disapproves. P.L. 94–258 April 5, 1976.

[3] Approximate gravity and sulphur levels are:

Elk Hills Stevens Zone, 36° API, .4 percent Sulphur.

Alaskan Sadlerochit, 27° API, .8 percent Sulphur.

California Kern River, 13° API, .8–1.0 percent Sulphur.

ALASKAN NATURAL GAS: THE SAGA CONTINUES

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, as one of the Members of Congress who vigorously opposed approval of the Trans-Canadian route for transporting Alaskan natural gas to the United States, I was very interested by a recent article outlining problems with getting the gas to the United States.

I hope the pricing problem will soon be solved by Congress, but that will leave the financing issue which was one raised during the debate last year. The article also fails to mention another problem of concern to many of us. Despite the fact this is an American project, the Canadian Government has taken a hard line toward using Canadian products for construction, which could cost Americans jobs and will likely hurt U.S. steel companies.

I would like to insert the news article from the July 24 Washington Star for the information of the Members.

ALASKAN GAS PIPELINE RUNS LATE BEFORE IT EVEN CAN GET STARTED

CALGARY, ALBERTA.—The much-heralded, 4,700-mile pipeline that was supposed to bring trillions of cubic feet of Alaskan natural gas to the rest of the United States by 1983 already is behind schedule.

And in the wake of political and financial problems, and new questions about when the gas actually will be needed, some experts are wondering if the pipeline—the largest project ever undertaken by private industry—will be ready on time.

If not, years from now, American consumers may find themselves shivering through short supplies of natural gas while huge quantities of the precious fuel are wasted in Alaska.

"There's a question right now as to whether or not a market exists for Alaskan gas," said Jim Kiely, a utilities expert for the U.S. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission who has been following the project since it was proposed several years ago.

Is there a chance that the project, now about six months behind schedule, will not be completed by 1983? "That's a possibility that has to be looked at," Kiely said.

Just last year, Kiely and other government officials were expressing great confidence that the pipeline would be completed in 1983, and the project's sponsors still say it will be. The timing is crucial because if the project is not finished within five years, many oil companies—now reinjecting the gas into oil wells—will be forced to "flare," or burn off, the gas at the wells.

Meanwhile, as delays mount, the project's cost—originally estimated at $10 billion—grows. Some estimates of the pipeline's final cost now reach $14 billion.

As designed, the pipeline would extend from Prudhoe Bay in Alaska, along the Alaskan Highway, down through the Yukon and across British Columbia and Alberta. In alberta, it would be split into two branches—one that would end on the U.S. West Coast and another that would end in the Chicago area.

According to estimates, there may be as much as 26 trillion cubic feet of natural gas in the North Alaskan fields that are now being pumped of oil. A year ago, amid natural-gas shortages that forced school closings and job layoffs in the Midwest, officials considered three plans for transporting that gas to the lower 48 states.

Canadian and U.S. officials finally agreed on the current project, then called the "Alcan" pipeline, now called the Foothills pipeline.

But since that agreement, two large roadblocks have developed. First, President Carter's energy program and its crucial guidelines for natural gas pricing have been blocked in Congress. The project's sponsors—several large Canadian and U.S. pipeline firms—cannot arrange financing until the price at which the gas can be sold is known.

Financing is believed to be the most difficult part. The total equity capital of all U.S. pipeline companies was $9 billion in 1975, the last year for which figures are available. Thus, the firms must borrow most of the $100 billion to $14 billion needed for the new pipeline, and they must borrow the huge amount without disrupting credit markets—a move that would make borrowed money even more expensive.

According to one estimate, each year's delay will add $1 billion to the project's cost.

"As soon as the gas pricing arrangements get out of Congress, the natural gas producers and buyers of the gas in the United States will sign contracts," said Diane Narvik, an official of Foothills Pipelines (Yukon) Ltd., the consortium that will build the Canadian portion. "Then those U.S. buyers will sign contracts with their local customers and we will have the basis to get into financing."

Narvik maintains that there will be no trouble raising the money. "There's quite a surplus of capital these days and we have a steady stream of people coming into this office wanting a piece of the action," she said.

But many analysts still believe federal loan guarantees will be necessary, although Narvik maintained that financing and construction costs will not rise to that point.

"People just aren't aware that this is relatively easy terrain to build on," she said. "Almost all of the pipeline will be underground. We certainly don't see where there should be any major overruns."

But, as Kiely pointed out, the project faces another large problem: Will Alaskan gas be needed soon enough to justify the enormous outlay of money and effort?

Just 18 months after the Midwest natural gas shortage, there is a "gas glut" in the United States.

A milder winter, conservation and federal restraints on gas usage have accounted for so much excess gas that there have been price decreases in parts of Texas, Louisiana and Oklahoma. One large California utility—Pacific Gas & Electric Co.—is running out of storage tanks for excess gas; after months of refusing to sign up new customers, many utilities around the country once again are soliciting business.

"One of the things the project has to decide is whether the United States will need the gas at the time it's delivered or if they (the pipeline operators) will have to develop another market to handle it for the short term," said Kiely.

If there is no immediate market for the Alaskan gas, a possibility which Kiely says must be considered, financing may be difficult to arrange and the project's completion further delayed. The glut is expected to end in five years—exactly when the gas either must be transported from Alaskan wells or burned uselessly.

That raises the possibility that, if financiers prove shortsighted, the pipeline may not be completed on time.

And even if the gas eventually does arrive in the lower 48 states, it is likely to be quite expensive. U.S. officials estimate its final cost at about $3–$4 per thousand cubic feet, compared to $2–$2.25 per thousand cubic feet for gas produced closer to market.

Narvik acknowledged that there is some doubt about whether the project will be completed on time, but she insisted that project officials are ready to begin.

"We have over 400 people right here working in the plans and they'd like nothing better than to go out and begin digging a ditch," she said. "If you guys (Americans) would get the energy bill through Congress, maybe we could get started."●

THE NATIONAL RIGHT TO WORK COMMITTEE

Hon. Theodore M. (Ted) Risenhoover

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. RISENHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, the National Right to Work Committee which has two problems of its own that I will address, has ordered congressional supporters of education to return our past contributions from schoolteachers.

Again, NRWC—which operates with secret money and from a platform of falsehoods—is trying to confuse the American voter.

A judge ruled that some of the National Education Association's political fundraising—a reverse checkoff system used in 16 States—was wrong. Teachers that contributed through reverse checkoff can get their money back—if they want it.

On that basis, NRWC lists about 300 Members of the House and Senate as having received "illegally collected campaign funds."

The NEA never collected any money in Oklahoma with the reverse checkoff system. Yet NRWC says I received "illegally" $1,300 from the teachers. The contributions were 100 percent legal from Oklahoma schoolteachers. Even money that "may have" been given my colleagues from the reverse checkoff system was received by the candidate's campaign committees in good faith. No Member or candidate should even consider returning the money unless they are requested. No thinking politician, lawmaker, or campaign committee should succumb to the false accusations of the NRWC.

Now, I will address the two problems of the NRWC.

Three years ago, I called upon the NRWC to disclose the source of its funding. It is one of the most powerful, ruthless, untruthful, but well-financed, lobbies in Washington. It has an invisible means of support. I have yet to see its contributor list unveiled. I am sure most of its supporters are not schoolteachers.

Second, NRWC does not—as its name wrongfully implies—have anything to do with a person's right to work. It simply is a secret front for worker-hating people who do not believe in equality among the four factors of production: land, capital, entrepreneurship, and labor. They are lobbying to replace "labor" with "slaves."●

TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO

HON. JOHN L. BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, those of us in Congress who support the Turkish arms embargo have repeatedly called for the administration to use the embargo as a means of encouraging Turkey to take concrete actions to promote a peaceful settlement of the Cyprus tragedy.

We have been deeply dismayed at the administration's unwillingness to act in this matter, and its concentration, instead, on mounting a battle to defeat Congress on this issue.

The futility of this approach is set forth most convincingly by Mary McGrory, political columnist of the Washington Star, in her column of July 17, 1978. Says Ms. McGrory:

"If he would put as much pressure on the Turks as he is putting on Congress, Jimmy Carter would have his repeal of the Turkish arms embargo handed to him on a silver platter."

Ms. McGrory notes that previous moves taken by Congress to encourage Turkish flexibility have met only continued Turkish intransigence, and she asks, in response to administration's claims about the effects of a total lifting of the embargo, "Why would the Turks be any more willing to bend with U.S. arms than without them?"

As we prepare to consider the Turkish arms question once again, I commend Ms. McGrory's excellent article to the attention of those of my colleagues who have doubts about the Carter administration's handling of important foreign policy matters.

THE PRESSURE CARTER'S PUTTING ON HILL MIGHT WORK ON TURKEY

(By Mary McGrory)

If he would put as much pressure on the Turks as he is putting on Congress, Jimmy Carter would have his repeal of the Turkish arms embargo handed to him on a silver platter.

The president is the chief lobbyist for the dubious cause. He invites groups of members to the White House for urgent briefings attended by the secretary of state, the secretary of defense, superlawyer Clark Clifford and the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Republicans receive telephone calls from Supreme NATO Commander Alexander Haig.

Turkey, they are told, has been "punished enough" for using U.S. arms to invade Cyprus in 1974.

The issue has divided Democrats, who have just been through the wringer of the Mideast warplanes sales and are not eager to embark on election-year "kamikaze missions" against their Greek constituencies.

"Why doesn't he put the screws on the Turks?" moaned one liberal who would like to help NATO and oblige his president.

"The problem here," said another, "is Carter's credibility. He just makes one foreign policy mistake after another. He's asking us to trust him to get something out of the Turks."

Turkey has been a sulking member of NATO since the embargo was imposed. What baffles some Democrats is that Carter is asking them to reward the Turks for bad conduct. Administration officials argue that the embargo hasn't worked and that a more indulgent attitude toward the transgressors is the only way.

If that's the case, some of them wonder, why don't we start being nice to Fidel Castro? Surely, our embargo against Cuba has not won hearts and minds in Havana. It has, instead, provoked Castro to such irritating countermeasures as the dispatch of troops to Africa. But any mention of diplomatic recognition as an alternative approach is frowned on by the Carter Establishment.

Turkey's intransigence on Cyprus—it still occupies 40 percent of the island, and, according to one European human rights investigating team, is severely mistreating Greek islanders—is put forward as the clincher for coddling them.

"Turkey and Greece have been at each other's throat for centuries on Cyprus," a White House official explained. "Our national interest is involved in NATO."

Two prominent Senate doves, Frank Church and George McGovern, have been won over to this "realistic" approach, but others are demanding to see a few cards from the Turks before they throw in their hand.

Why would the Turks be any more willing to bend with U.S. arms than without them? The embargo was never total. We slipped them supplies through the back door of an overseas Pentagon branch office. Last year, Congress tried to bribe them into a show of flexibility by upping their covert allowance from $125 million to $175 million. They did not move an inch. Carter's announcement of his intention to resume the full flow inspired them to invite battered Greek refugees back to Famagusta—to live under Turkish occupation.

President Carter "reassured" a large delegation of Greek-American leaders whom he invited to the White House last month that there had been "absolutely no progress on Cyprus"—as if this would dilute their rage over his broken campaign pledge to "couple the improvement in relations with Turkey with increased fair progress on the Cyprus issue."

If the Carter administration has taken any steps to bring about the "coupling," they have been well concealed. Our ambassador to Turkey, Ronald Squires, last January said his "only hope was that the embargo will be removed."

Assent of both houses is required for repeal. The Senate will go first, and the leader of the Greek forces, Sen. Paul Sarbanes, D-Md., is hopeful that logic—and reminders of Jimmy Carter's call for morality in foreign policy—will win the day.

Sarbanes, a freshman, is remembered for his dogged endeavors on the House impeachment committee. He is of Greek origin, but not the wily kind. His friends say that if he had been among the troops outside Troy, he would not have been working on the fateful gift horse; he would have been throwing words over the wall.

"He is leafleting the Senate," says a colleague. "Every time you meet him, he hands you some literature."

Sarbanes goes on the floor armed with reprints of anti-repeal editorials from English and American papers, reprints of pre-reversal statements by Carter and Secretary of State Vance. Lately he has been handing out copies of Laurence Sterne's history of the Turkish invasion, "The Wrong Horse."

Sarbanes says Carter has failed to use international leverage. NATO ambassadors should be routed, not to Capitol Hill, but to Ankara, where the English and the Germans have special influence, to lean on the Turks.

On a more immediate level, he believes that if Carter is willing to write off the Greek vote, his colleagues are not. The administration's high-powered spokesmen say it's "pragmatic" to vote for repeal; but the Greek-American lobby, second only to the Jewish community in activism, is telling them it's not. And it votes.●

BISHOP PEDRO CASALDALIGA OF BRAZIL AND HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, just 2 weeks ago the world was shocked and dismayed as the Soviet Union proceeded to try and convict Anatoly Scharansky, Yuri Orlov and Aleksandr Ginzburg. These trials have taken on great symbolic value for those of us who are wholeheartedly committed to the cause of worldwide humanitarianism.

Today I wish to share with my colleagues the story of a man whose whole life is a trial in defense of the human rights of impoverished Indians and migrants living in Mato Grosso and Goias, Brazil, Bishop Pedro Casaldaliga. Bishop Casaldaliga, a Claretian missionary priest, has been on "trial" since 1968. His quest for human rights and dignity in Brazil is a living example of the democratic principles which I find most inspiring. Immediately after reading of him I was reminded of a statement made by President Woodrow Wilson, Liberty does not consist of mere declarations of the rights of men. It consists in the translation of those declarations into definite actions.

With this in mind I commend to the Members the following article by John Kuenster which appeared in the July issue of the U.S. Catholic:

BISHOP PEDRO CASALDALIGA: PROTECTING PEOPLE FROM THE POWERS

(By John Kuenster)

If a man's physical appearance reflected his qualities of courage, integrity, or leadership, it would be extremely difficult to gain an accurate reading of Bishop Pedro Casaldaliga, C.M.F. of Sao Felix, Brazil.

He is a thin, unpretentious-looking man whose personal and spiritual discipline add an unseen dimension of strength to his frail physique. There is a sense of warmth, compassion, and self-effacement about him that stamps him as a particularly magnetic human being.

Casaldaliga has attracted international attention for his defense of the human rights of impoverished Indians and migrants living in Mato Grosso and Goias. As well, his firm stand has attracted considerable hostility among powerful Brazilians.

His diocese covers 57,900 square miles of largely underdeveloped land. When Casaldaliga first arrived there in 1968, there were no modern conveniences such as electricity, telephones, postal services, medical care, and hard-surfaced roads.

At that time, multinational corporations were seizing huge tracts of land. They had only callous disregard for the poor, neglected posseiros (squatters) who had been eking out a living in the sparsely populated Amazon bush country.

Approximately 100,000 people live in Casaldaliga's diocese, an area comparable in size to the state of Michigan. Theoretically, there should be enough land for everyone, and that is one reason why the area has attracted landless people from all parts of Brazil.

In the mid-1960s, national and foreign corporations, with the encouragement of the Brazilian military regime, began grabbing large parcels of land in Mato Grosso and Goias and forced out the squatters. In one case, a worker accepted a small price for his land. When he went back to harvest a few remaining crops, he was shot. The money he had received for his land was used to save his life and nurse him back to health.

When Casaldaliga went to Brazil as a Claretian missionary priest, he often worked side by side with his parishoners, planting and harvesting. He knew his people, understood their problems, and resolved to stand with them. He once wrote on a banana leaf:

> We are the people of the nation.
> We are a people of God.
> We want a place on earth.
> In heaven, we already have one.

In 1970, a year before he was consecrated a bishop, Casaldaliga prepared a report denouncing the conditions of life in his parish and sent it to civilian and church authorites. Almost immediately he was warned that his report was subversive. The state police began to keep him under surveillance. The landowners began systematic harassment of his parishioners.

As he continued his resistance to the injustices in Mato Grosso and Goias, Casaldaliga knew he was inviting his expulsion from Brazil. He had sided with the poor against the rich, a move destined to make him a marked man.

There have been several attempts to kill Casaldaliga. The threats have spurred him to even greater efforts to bring some semblance of human dignity to his people. With the help of his pastoral team of Claretians, diocesan priests, and laity, he has appealed to the government and large corporations to protect the rights of the small landowners in Mato Grosso and Goias. The odds are stacked against him since the state police are at the service of influential power brokers and corporations.

Casaldaliga's appeals have gone unheeded, and there have been incidents of harassment by the police, evictions, imprisonment of parishioners, closing of parochial schools, and the expulsion of priests.

Powerful Brazilians do not look kindly upon Casaldaliga's efforts in social reform based on the gospel message of love. They bristle at his open defiance.

In 1973, his residence in Sao Felix was surrounded and searched. He and his staff—20 or so priests, nuns, and lay people—were questioned, and some were beaten. The nuns' infirmary was declared illegal and replaced by a medical station. Teachers at the diocesan school were threatened.

"How wonderful to be persecuted for the sake of the Gospel!" exclaimed Casaldaliga.

Once, the bishop was arrested in connection with his defense of a French priest of his diocese, Francois Jentel, who earlier had been sentenced to a ten-year term in prison on charges of sedition. Casaldaliga denounced the priest's trial as a "farce," and his cry of protest stirred public opinion in Brazil. The bishop's outcry and pressure from other church leaders brought about a commutation of the priest's sentence, although the clergyman was expelled from the country a year later.

As a bishop, Casaldaliga is completely devoid of ostentation. He is highly visible, traveling constantly within his parish and to other cities. During these visits, he frequently wears a sport shirt, slacks, and sandals. It is hard to distinguish him from the many workers and townspeople he mingles with.

At the time of his consecration, as a bishop, Casaldaliga said he would "use the straw hat of the laborer instead of a miter, the truth of the Gospel for a crosier, the faith of the people as a shield, and the strength of hope and freedom as gloves."

Without the civilized comforts of life and without the accoutrements of title, Casaldaliga has become a symbol of hope for the poor in Mato Grosso and Goias.

The bishop has no intentions of changing the course he has taken. "Our church," he said, "is once again the church of the catacombs."

In 1974 when military personnel again invaded and ransacked Casaldaliga's residence in Sao Felix, they arrested, beat, and tortured four priests and temporarily held the bishop prisoner.

But the bishop continued his campaign to document and protest injustices in the states of Mato Grosso and Goias.

Large landowners and civil authorities plotted to have him ousted from Brazil. They leveled accusations against the Spanish-born bishop, saying he was subversive, that he was linked to the Communist movement, and that he tried to provoke the rebellion of settlers against the big landowners.

The slanderous attack on Casaldaliga brought a wave of protest from United States and Brazilian bishops. Bishop Ivo Lorscheiter, secretary general of the Brazilian National Bishops Conference, announced there was nothing in the work of Casaldaliga to justify his expulsion. A group of Brazilian bishops, led by Cardinal Paulo Evaristo Arns of Sao Paulo, successfully appealed to Pope Paul to prevent Casaldaliga from being deported on the trumped-up charges.

Threat of death, destruction of homes, and the burning of fields have accompanied eviction of the Indians from their land. In fighting these injustices, Casaldaliga has come close to death himself.

One night in October, 1976, a Jesuit priest, John Bosco Penido Burnier, who worked among the Indians in Mato Grosso, overheard a discussion Casaldaliga was having with a Brazilian youth.

The boy informed the bishop that two local women were being held prisoners at a nearby police station. He said the women were screaming, "Please don't beat us!"

"I felt an obligation to go to the police station to plead in favor of these poor women," Casaldaliga said. "The boy wanted to come with me, but I wouldn't let him. He was very young, and he would be marked for the police. Father John Bosco heard our talk and joined right in to go with me."

Two ranch foremen and two soldiers met Casaldaliga and Bosco. They insulted and threatened the bishop and priest.

Casaldaliga told the men the women's imprisonment was illegal. "You have no reason to torture them," he said.

The police defended their actions, insisting that what they were doing was legal. Bosco calmly challenged them, saying he would report the incident to their superiors when he passed through the town of Cuiaba.

One of the soldiers crossed over to the priest and struck him in the face. Casaldaliga suggested they leave, but the soldier continued to hit the priest below the right eye with his revolver. The gun went off, and the bullet entered the skull of Bosco above the right eye, lodging in the brain.

With the help of friends, Casaldaliga rushed Bosco to a small, local clinic and later accompanied him on a flight to a neurological center in Goiania.

"But it was all futile," the bishop said. "Father died the following day in Goiania. We buried him in Diamantino, beneath the sun of the Mato Grosso, amid songs of the Resurrection of the whole pueblo. The news reporters who were there were impressed. Some of them cried."

Later, Casaldaliga presented a declaration of protest to the federal police in the archbishop's house at Cuiaba.

"Pray that we will be faithful," he wrote to friends outside of Brazil, "that the church remains as witness to the very end. Don't worry about us, but pray that we are not overly preoccupied about ourselves. The Lord is the Resurrection and the life. It is not a sad hour. It is a beautiful hour of the Gospel."

Casaldaliga believes the policeman who attacked Bosco did so thinking the Jesuit priest was the bishop.

"Why was it Father John Bosco and not me?" he has often asked.

Casaldaliga makes a point of being accessible to his flock. He had been in Ribeirao Bonita at the time of Bosco's slaying to be present during the last days of a novena to Our Lady of Apparitions, patroness of the local townspeople.

The members of the mission team in the Sao Felix diocese "give very positive witness to Christian living," says Father Richard Todd, a Chicago Claretian who visited the area recently. "Their poorness, their intimate contact with the people, and their dedication exemplify gospel values."

Under Casaldaliga's direction, the missionaries have not only resisted oppression of the poor people, but also have made efforts to provide medical services and promote hygiene and nutrition in local communities. At the Catholic mission house in each of the towns, a well has been dug for the use of the entire community. Latrine programs have also been encouraged to improve sanitary conditions in the towns.

A few years ago, Casaldaliga established several schools in the area, but they were closed by the government. The government has also tried to curtail the missionaries' medical services by offering a service of its own, but, according to Todd, the government program has been ineffective. "The medical personnel sent into the area by the government do not have a genuine interest in serving the poor people.

"That is one thing that cannot be said of Bishop Casaldaliga. His concern for people is rooted in a deep and abiding faith."

Casaldaliga's spirituality shines through his life, but it does not obscure his humanness. There have been times in the past when he has longed to return to his homeland, times when sporadic desires have arisen in him to flee the misery, poverty, and suffering around him. But Casaldaliga will never voluntarily return to Spain because he knows that if he leaves he may be barred from reentering Brazil.

The heroic stance of Casaldaliga has put the church in a new perspective in the eyes of the people he serves and has been an example and inspiration to all priests, religious, and laity working in Latin America.

Casaldaliga has clearly defined his position to his parishioners, to fellow church leaders, and to the world at large.

"The church and the prelacy of Sao Felix," he wrote in a pastoral letter, "in communion with the church of the Third World, for reasons of the Gospel and summoned by local reality, chooses the oppressed."

That statement, among others, inspired charges that the Claretian bishop was a Communist.

When a local campesino (farmer) was asked what he thought about having his bishop called a Communist, he said, "If being a Communist means being common, there is no doubt about it. Our bishop is a common, unpretentious man. But in another sense, he is a very uncommon man—and for that we are grateful."●

SENIOR CITIZEN INTERNS IN PRESSLER OFFICE

HON. LARRY PRESSLER

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

SENIOR CITIZEN INTERNS

Many thanks to Ruth and Carl Hansen, ages 65 and 70, of Parker, South Dakota who participated in the Congressional Senior Intern Program this year. They contributed much to my office during their two-week stay in Washington.

The Hansens spent their time working in my office, and attending special meetings with agencies and private organizations on senior citizen matters.

Many of the interns spent their time in discussions with various Congressional experts, in working sessions with administration officials, in White House briefings, in Congressional committee hearings, or in other functions.

Topics of discussion at the meetings included elderly consumer and transportation problems, Social Security, and Medicare.

South Dakotans who would like to participate in the program next year should write to "Senior Intern Program," 1132 Longworth House Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20515.

Any senior citizen group wishing to hear about the Hansens' Washington internship should contact them in Parker, S.D. No. 605–297–3385. The Hansens are available to speak to groups.●

SPIRIT OF COMPROMISE NEEDED FOR BWCA

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues in this House know the extent to which the Boundary Waters Canoe Area has become a highly charged issue in my district and throughout my home State of Minnesota.

The long conflict has exacted a considerable emotional toll from those who care deeply about the BWCA.

The people living in the area, people I represent in this House, have a tremendous stake in the future of an area upon which their way of life and, in many cases their livelihoods, depend so heavily.

While I cannot support a narrow single use concept for the area, I also recognize the tremendous emotional commitment to this issue among many who favor total wilderness.

Throughout the long debate I have hoped the willingness to compromise and the recognition of the variety of conflicting, but nevertheless valid, rights would resolve the controversy.

At this point, we have achieved consensus on the major issues of timber harvesting, mining, and wilderness status. My BWCA proposal, the bill passed by this House last month, and the Anderson-Humphrey bill now being considered in the Senate all would prohibit timber harvesting and mining in the BWCA. These three proposals would reaffirm wilderness designation for the entire 1,030,000 acres now in the Boundary Waters.

Differences now center on the extent to which motorized recreational use of the area will be permitted to continue. This is a people question—the question of who will use the area, and in what manner.

John McMillion, publisher of the Duluth News-Tribune—the largest daily newspaper in my district—devoted his weekly column, Publisher's Corner, last Sunday to a discussion of the need for compromise in the resolution of the issue.

Mr. McMillion focuses on the essential elements in ending the long controversy—the spirit of compromise and the recognition of the many interests at stake. They include the protection of the environment, the rights of the local people and the rights of all Americans to enjoy the BWCA, either as a canoeist or as a fisherman.

I urge my colleagues to read Mr. McMillion's excellent column.

[From the Duluth News-Tribune, July 23, 1978]

ANIMOSITY NO ANSWER FOR BWCA

(By John McMillion)

There is a message all concerned should listen to in the advice given in the BWCA conflict last week.

U.S. Sen. James Abourezk, D-S.D., head of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, advised those involved to settle the issue among themselves rather than dump it into the lap of Congress. Abourezk points out whatever Congress might come up with could prove unpalatable to both parties.

Nothing could be more dangerous in an issue as emotional and localized as this than litigation conceived in an election year.

Take note of the number of federal, state, and now county candidates who suddenly have become BWCA experts, whereas before they generally ignored the issue.

Beware of politicians bearing gifts in an election year.

Take heed of Abourezk's warning and resolve the thing among yourselves. No doubt Congress will accept anything all parties recommend.

The tricky part, of course, is to get all the parties to agree on something.

It is going to take some understanding and willingness to give, not only from those who favor a general multiple use of the BWCA but also from the environmentalists.

Some will say compromise between these two factions is impossible, but nothing is impossible and I've seen some labor agreements hammered out through the collective bargaining process when at the onset both sides were pretty far apart.

The Boundary Water Conservation Alliance has indicated, through its official, Ed Zabinski, it may be willing to try this approach. Zabinski said the alliance's board of directors will meet Monday to consider appointing a representative to mediate the dispute with the other side, the Friends of the Boundary Waters Wilderness, a group favoring total wilderness.

We hope Zabinski's group does agree to try and mediate. The environmentalist faction has agreed to do so. Neither side has a thing to lose and Abourezk has set it up for a staff member of the Senate subcommittee on parks and recreation. Tom Williams, to act as the mediator.

It won't be easy because the animosity between the two sides is deep.

The key to whether something is resolved is whether the environmentalists are willing to give. The folks who reside in the BWCA have moved quite a ways, not necessarily willingly, if you consider where the bill regulating the BWCA stands as passed by the House of Representatives as compared with the one presented by Rep. James Oberstar, D-Minn., the Congress member representing the district in which the BWCA lies.

The gut issue now is the matter of motorized boating in portions of the BWCA. The lakes and routes approved by the House for such use are too meager in the eyes of those aligned with the Alliance and if there is room for some give by the environmentalists this is where it is, in my mind.

I certainly cannot pretend to be an expert on the BWCA as my knowledge is pretty well limited to what I have gleaned following the controversy and from a couple of visits to the area, the most recent this past week.

In my opinion, and it is no more than that, there are three considerations.

First the consideration of protecting the environment must be given heavy weight.

Then the rights of the people who live in that area must be a factor, and coupled with this are some of the economic realities involved.

Thirdly the rights of the average resident of this nation, the person who wants some use of the area, who by virtue of being a taxpayer has some rights, cannot be ignored.

I also feel on the basis of my limited exposure that because someone is a canoeist does not guarantee he or she is a purist nor by the same token because someone is a fisherman, or fisherwoman, or fisherperson, does not guarantee he or she is a pig.

In fact the area I fished in this past week was more overrun by canoeists than by those fishing in boats propelled by small motors.

And the lack of expertise or common judgment exercised by some of those canoeing made me wonder if the safety factor cited by the pro-boat advocates might not bear more weight than is being given.

So I think the puzzle has to be put together in a manner where reasonable, and the word reasonable is the key, consideration is given to environmental concerns, the economy of the area and to the average citizen who wants to go fishing or just eye the scenery but with the aid of some motorized propulsion.

The proper mix may be nearer than all concerned feel.

Right now the environmentalists are riding pretty high and don't see the need to do much compromising.

These people must be given credit for awakening the average American to the abuses of the environment prevalent for years from all corners, industry included but perhaps more important from all of us as individuals.

And anyone with a grain of sense does not want the lakes of the BWCA to become the junked-up puddles lined with wall-to-wall cabins as is the case in much of the rest of Minnesota.

And I think the majority of the people of this state would accept extreme limitations on use of the BWCA. For the water skier, the big motor boater and others of this ilk there is plenty of water elsewhere in the state.

But if the environmentalist gets too dogmatic, unyielding, too arrogant from the flush of recent victories, he or she could create a reverse reaction eventually.

THE PUBLIC REJECTS ALL TAX CREDITS AND SUPPORTS STUDENT AID

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the Roper Organization, a nationally respected polling company, recently published its second annual study of public attitudes toward the Federal income tax system. Included in their survey were questions relating to tuition tax credits.

When presented with the alternatives of expanding existing student aid programs or adopting a tuition tax credit as a means to aid families in meeting college costs, the public clearly prefers the student aid option. Only 9 percent of the public supports a tuition tax credit for postsecondary education like the one adopted by the House in H.R. 12050 on June 1. In addition, 64 percent of the respondents opposed a tuition tax credit for elementary and secondary education, and only 28 percent were in favor.

This survey clearly demonstrates that tuition tax credits enjoy the support of only a small minority of Americans.

At this point in the RECORD I would like to insert the relevant chapter from the Roper study:

CHAPTER V—TAX AID FOR EDUCATION

CHAPTER SUMMARY

A major issue with regard to tax reform during the past year has been that of providing tax aid for education. This study explored public opinion on tax aid for college tuition and for private elementary and secondary school tuition.

Of four plans to provide tax aid for college tuition, the Carter proposal to make more middle income people eligible for government grants or loans by raising income eligibility was the most popular. A relatively small minority approved direct government aid to colleges and universities. But the public turns thumbs down on a flat $250 personal tax deduction annually when a child is in college—either for everyone regardless of income or for those with less than $25,000 income.

Furthermore, the public gives a resounding "No" to extending tax aid to private elementary and secondary schools. The idea is equally disapproved when parochial schools are mentioned and when they are not mentioned.

TAX AID FOR COLLEGE TUITION

With college tuition costs rising at a rapid rate, a number of proposals have been made for providing tax aid for college tuition. In this study four plans were put before the public as means of helping people cope with the cost of college. The question explained that all four would mean higher tax rates to bring in the extra billion and a half dollars each plan would cost.

The public turns thumbs down on a flat $250 annual tax reduction for each year a child is in college—either for everyone regardless of income or for those with less than $25,000 income. The Carter proposal to make more middle income people eligible for government grants or loans by raising the income eligiblity for them was the most popular of the four plans, approved by one-third of the public. Only 1 in 5 approved direct government aid to colleges and universities so they can hold down tuition fees. Only 16 percent favored none of the plans.

All subgroups of the population agreed pretty much along the same lines on the four plans, including those who have children of college age.

Q. 23. There's a good deal of concern about the high cost of college. Here are four approaches that have been suggested for helping people cope with the cost of a college education—all of which would mean higher tax rates to bring in the extra billion and a half dollars that each of these four plans would cost. (Card shown respondent) Which of these plans would you favor, or wouldn't you favor any of them if it meant raising the tax rate?

TAX AID FOR PRIVATE ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY SCHOOLS

The public gives a resounding "No" to extending tax aid to private elementary and secondary schools. It was explained that the same four plans for college aid could be used for lower private schools, but that doing so would mean tax rates high enough to bring in four and a half billion dollars rather than one and a half billion dollars. On this basis, the public said it was opposed to extending aid to lower schools by 64 percent to 28 percent. For half the sample, the question asked about private and parochial schools, for the other half the question asked only about private schools, with no mention of parochial. Answers were virtually identical regardless of mention of parochial schools.

A majority of all subgroups are opposed to tax aid for private elementary and secondary schools with the exception of Catholics and even Catholics are more opposed (48 percent) than in favor of it (43 percent).

Q. 24X. These same four plans could be used for children in private elementary and secondary schools as well as for children in colleges. But if they were extended to private schools it would mean tax rates high enough to bring in four and a half billion dollars rather than one and a half billion dollars. Would you be in favor of or opposed to extending tuition aid to private schools?

Q. 24Y. These same four plans could be used for children in private and parochial elementary and secondary schools as well as for children in colleges. But if they were extended to private and parochial schools it would mean tax rates high enough to bring in four and a half billion dollars rather than one and a half billion dollars. Would you be in favor of or opposed to extending tuition aid to private and parochial schools?

KEY CONGRESSIONAL AID AND THE SUGAR INDUSTRY

HON. RAYMOND F. LEDERER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. LEDERER. Mr. Speaker, as far back as May 22, 1978, and as late as July 21, 1978, I have conveyed my uneasiness to my colleagues in the House about reports raising serious conflict of interest charges by former key congressional aides in both the drafting and lobbying efforts behind S. 2990 and its companion bill, H.R. 12486, the Sugar Stabilization Acts of 1978, currently under consideration by both Houses of Congress.

Ethical questions raised by such diverse sources as the Washington Post, the U.S. News & World Report, the New York Times, the Washington Star, and Knight Ritter Newspapers indicate a situation which goes beyond what amounts to a revolving door behind the sugar producing industry and key congressional aides.

Unfortunately, my worst suspicions have been confirmed by a recent Consumer Federation of America investigation, the summary of which I wish to share with my colleagues in the House. Official and quasi-official acts have been attributed to these aides in the drafting and promoting of sugar producing industry legislation while these aides were still in the employ of Congress and yet shortly before they began working for the sugar growers lobby. At the very least, there seems to be a violation of the postemployment lobbying section of the Senate Code of Official Conduct which states "For a 1-year period after leaving, an employee on a Member's personal staff cannot lobby the Member or his other staff members, a committee staff member cannot lobby committee staff or Members, and an S. Res. 60 employee cannot lobby any of the above."

My fears continue that these occurrences may only be one narrow aspect of an entire industrywide lobbying effort by the sugar producers, which is subverting the integrity of the legislative process. It is my belief that these massive efforts by the sugar producers' lobby are attempts to compensate for the fact that H.R. 12486 and S. 2990 sacrifices the interests of the American consumer and this Nation's battle against inflation, for the narrow few who would benefit from such legislation. I sincerely believe that my colleagues in the House will recognize the fact that poor legislation is poor legislation, no matter what efforts are attempted to secure its passage.

The Consumer Federation of America press release follows:

CONSUMER FEDERATION OF AMERICA

At a time when consumers can least afford a big boost in sugar prices, why is Congress pushing that hike on behalf of fewer than 1 percent of our nation's farmers?

Consumer Federation of America, the nation's largest consumer organization, today disclosed information which goes far towards explaining the success of one of the most powerful and effective lobbying efforts now on Capitol Hill.

In announcing its findings which developed in light of CFA's own intensive lobbying in opposition to pending sugar legislation, Executive Director Kathleen F. O'Reilly stated, "We are convinced that the door between the halls of Congress and the sugar lobby revolves at a disturbingly fast pace."

According to CFA, the ranks of that lobby are filled with former Congressional aides who worked on sugar legislation. Furthermore, it is immeasurably aided by Senators and Representatives from the sugar-producing states of Louisiana, Texas, Idaho, Hawaii, Utah and Minnesota. Since every legislated price hike for sugar is followed by increased markets for corn sweeteners, additional support comes from Congressional representatives of Western and Midwestern corn-producing states. Many of these members hold key positions on Congressional committees with jurisdiction over sugar legislation.

"This powerful combination of forces is totally ignoring the overwhelming inflationary impact on consumers which passage of the Church/de la Garza bills would produce," commented O'Reilly.

"It is clear that the involvement of former Congressional aides goes well beyond the much publicized gifts of Dwayne Andreas, head of the Archer-Daniels Midland Company, a large corn sweetener manufacturer." O'Reilly was referring to the appointment of David Gartner, former administrative assistant to the late Senator Hubert Humphrey (D-MN), to the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, despite Gartner's acceptance of $72,000 in trust funds from Andreas while working for Humphrey.

CFA found that another former key Humphrey aide, Herbert Waters, has followed the revolving door into the sugar industry. Waters is currently president of Tadco Enterprises, a private lobbying firm hired by Archer Daniels to help ensure passage of the Church/de la Garza bills.

The interplay between the industry and Congressional staff members goes even further, CFA disclosed. Tadco has hired Karth-Best Associates, another lobbying firm, to aid in the sugar legislation campaign. Robert Best, partner of former Representative Joe Karth, was a legislative assistant to Senator Russell Long (D-La.) until 1977. (Long, whose Louisiana constituents include a substantial number of cane sugar growers, is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. His Subcommittee on Tourism and Sugar, chaired by Senator Spark Matsunaga (D-HI), initiated hearings on the Church bill.)

Best has been implicated, along with Karth and Waters, in writing a letter, dated August 16, 1977, which Gartner sent to the Senate Agriculture Committee under Humphrey's signature making recommendations that could bring a multimillion-dollar bonanza to the corn sweetener industry. According to Knight-Ridder Newspapers, the letter was signed by an office signature machine in Humphrey's absence.

Among the employees at Karth-Best is Will Leonard, another former Long legislative assistant. Leonard was appointed to the International Trade Commission (ITC) in 1968, where he led fights for sugar producers. He resigned from the ITC on June 10, 1977, and immediately became involved with Karth-Best in its sugar lobbying efforts.

A close associate of Senate Agriculture Committee Chairman Herman Talmadge (D-Ga.) is also involved in the pattern. Until March 1978, Michael McLeod was general counsel and staff director of the Senate Agriculture Committee and right-hand assistant to Talmadge. He played a key role in drafting the Church bill. He now lobbies for the Florida Sugar Cane League, despite promises upon leaving the committee that he would not become a lobbyist (Washington Post, March 21, 1978). Coincidentally, McLeod was retained by the League's Horace Godfrey, a USDA official until 1969. Godfrey also represents Texas sugar growers.

Still another player is Dale Sherwin, former minority staff counsel to the Senate Agriculture Committee and assistant to Senator Robert Dole (R.-Ka.) until his resignation in March of this year. He is now lobbying for the Church bill on behalf of A. E. Staley, one of the country's leading corn sweetener manufacturers. Sherwin helped draft and develop the bill while on the Committee staff.

Among other corporate food giants the financial success of which is tied to sugar legislation is the Heinz Corporation. Its corn sweetener interests are represented by the consulting firm of former Nixon White House aide, William Timmons.

"In spite of these overwhelming odds," concluded O'Reilly, "CFA will continue to vigorously voice its opposition on behalf of American consumers and urge the Administration to stand firm in opposing any measure which would raise the price of sugar."●

THE ROAD TO PROSPERITY—PART XIV—HOW DO PEOPLE AVOID PAYING TAXES?

HON. WILLIAM A. STEIGER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Speaker, in the barrage of rhetoric from the administration, the Washington Post and the New York Times against the Investment Incentive Act, there has been one common theme. It is that my proposal is unfair; that it will enable some people to avoid paying taxes. This is the backbone of the arguments against the Steiger amendment. It is time to look at the problem in greater detail.

There are two aspects of the problem. The first is determine what comprises income. Income is the return or reward someone receives in exchange for their labor. Capital is the source of the tools which enables a worker to employ his or her labor. Some economists and some Presidents would tax capital, in the form of capital gains, as ordinary income. This, in effect, turns the income tax into a wealth tax. Not only is it a confusion of objectives, but it taxes away our capital stock which is necessary to expand plant and equipment, produce jobs, and increase economic growth.

Back in 1937, Irving Fisher, hardly a proponent of business or wealthy taxpayers, wrote that any gains in capital value are not properly income. He added,

> They (capital gains) are capital; and to tax them as income and later to tax the income flowing from this is a form of double taxation.

Income earned by money—that is, investment—should be taxed in the same manner as income earned by labor. However, we do not tax a laborer who has engaged in work. We tax the results of his labor. In the same light, we should not tax the capital which produces income. I should remind the readers that capital is produced by savings. That savings is acquired from income which is taxed. This is appropriate. But it is not appropriate to tax the capital base itself.

The second problem is how do people avoid paying taxes. Critics contend that the reduction of the capital gains tax only benefits the wealthy thereby creating an inequity in the tax code. This argument conveniently ignores several facts.

First, since 1969, the only individual income tax increase has been on capital gains, but only on gains realized above a certain income tax bracket. It stands to reason that a reduction in the tax will benefit only those who had their taxes increased. The critics' argument is based on circular, meaningless logic.

All other income taxes since 1969 have decreased. In effect, taxes have been indexed to inflation. The same can be said for salaries and wages—practically everyone now receives cost of living adjustments. The one exception is capital gains. The tax has increased, while inflation has eroded any real gain. It is no wonder that individual investors are dropping out of the stock market, and that those with high incomes are switching to tax-free municipal bonds.

Besides an increase in the tax rate on capital gains, another tax was imposed in the form of the minimum tax. The minimum tax was aimed at those who had high incomes, but were paying little or no income tax. While the number of people in this category declined for several years after the 1969 tax reforms, the number has climbed back up. The minimum tax has not solved this problem. Unfortunately, for many other people, it has become an additional tax. This was not the intended purpose of this tax provision.

The capital gains tax structure is used by many middle and upper income taxpayers to legitimately reduce their tax burden. There is nothing pernicious, immoral, or offensive about their action. But, is the capital gains tax the culprit as far as millionaires who pay no tax is concerned? A recent study by the liberal Brookings Institution analyzed this problem. The higher income taxpayers with the least tax obligations do not rely on capital gains to reduce their taxes. Over half of their tax burden is eliminated by the use of personal deductions, such as contributions to charity. Capital gains account for less than 10 percent of the tax reductions. Yet, capital gains is the major portion of the minimum tax, accounting for 80 percent of the revenue. The personal deductions, the actual culprit, account for less than 10 percent of the minimum tax. Something is obviously wrong. If people are really concerned about tax avoidance, then let's go to the heart of the problem and levy tax on those items responsible for tax avoidance.

I should also remind the readers that unlike other income taxes, the tax on capital gains is completely controlled by the taxpayer. They decide when to realize the gain. Many people remain locked into existing investments because of high taxes. This deprives our economy of recycled investment funds. Others invest in nonproductive, but tax-free, items such as municipal bonds. And, a smart lawyer can always find ways to avoid taxes. The recent Washington Post article on the sale of the Hill 'n Dale estate reveals one device—leasing, rather than selling—to avoid capital gains taxes.

The Post article follows:

WHO DOESN'T BEAR THE TAX BURDEN

The concept of equitable treatment under the tax system has been of considerable public concern in recent years. Tax preferences were an important issue in the 1976 Presidential election, and the winner promised fundamental reform of the income tax.

Many of the most significant contributions to the study of the erosion of the tax base and the popular interest in tax reform have been made by Joseph A. Pechman.[1] Several of these showed, through a graphical technique, how much the various tax preferences reduced liability in different income classes. This paper will expand upon that analysis by (1) quantifying the average effective tax rates paid at all income levels, according to the tax schedule used and the number of exemptions claimed; (2) searching the population at all incomes for taxpayers with liabilities in different proportions of the average for their income class and household status; and (3) analyzing the effects of tax preferences used by groups of households according to the degree of difference between their taxes and the average. Comparisons can thus be made between groups of tax returns with similar degrees of tax avoidance at different income levels, and between others with different degrees of tax avoidance at the same income levels. This analysis will be based upon the Brookings 1970 MERGE file.[2]

The first part of this paper will describe the procedures used to group tax returns according to the relationship of their tax liabilities to the average for their type of return and income class. The second part will show the relative importance of tax preference items in reducing tax liabilities, with comparisons among taxpayers grouped by the relationship of their liabilities to the average. A brief conclusion will follow.

DETERMINATION OF AVERAGE EFFECTIVE TAX RATES

Popular interest in tax equity issues typically focuses on tax paid over various levels of income, judged by some subjective standard of vertical equity. For present purposes, however, the major emphasis will be upon tax paid relative to he average effective rate at a given level of income. This standard is chosen because the equal taxation of equals is a more widely endorsed principle than any possible standards for the appropriate treatment of unequals. From a more pragmatic viewpoint, any broadening or narrowing of tax preferences that did not change the distribution of average effective rates would not change total revenue, which is presumably set according to public sector needs rather distributional preferences; thus this horizontal equity approach can provide insights to the need for and effects of tax reform independent of redistributional questions.

Any measurement of the average effective tax rate must take account of a number of provisions of the tax law that introduce dispersion into tax liabilities at any given income level with no intervention by the taxpayer. Two taxpayers with the same incomes might pay taxes according to different tax rate schedules and claim different standard deductions and personal exemptions; it would be misleading to compare their taxes as though they were identically situated. Therefore several adjustments are made in the analysis described here. First, taxpayers filing each of the four different types of returns (married filing jointly, married filing separately, single. head of household) are analyzed separately. Second, a new income measure called "standard taxable income" (STI) is used to compute average effective tax rates. STI is defined as total income [3] less the appropriate standard deduction under the tax law in question, less the total amount of personal exemptions for the taxpayer(s) and dependents. These two adjustments control for the varying sizes and filing statuses of different taxpayers.

One further difficulty, this one computational, is how to categorize each individual return with respect to the average effective tax rate for its income level. The average rate could be computed for a large number of income intervals, and each individual return's effective rate compared with the average for its class. Such results would be inaccurate, however, because with a progressive tax the average effective rate would be expected to increase from the bottom of each interval to the top. Thus, the average for the entire interval would not be an appropriate standard for the extremes unless the interval were very small. The smaller the income interval, of course, the smaller the sample of tax returns within that interval, and therefore the greater the sampling variation of the mean within each interval.

The alternative chosen here was to estimate the average effective tax rate through a set of four regression equations—one for each type of tax return—relating the effective tax rates to incomes. To determine an individual return's relationship to the average rate, then, the appropriate equation was solved using the precise income level of the return, and the solution value was taken to be the average rate. This technique circumvented the problems of progressivity within income intervals and sampling variation described above.

Of several alternative specifications tried, the best fit of effective tax rates (that is, liabilities as a percentage of STI) to STI was obtained through a simple single logarithmic transformation where T is tax liability and STI is standard taxable income. In order to obtain a satisfactory fit, it was necessary to impose some restrictions on the sample. First, returns with negative standard taxable incomes were omitted from the analysis. Some low income tax returns were eligible for negative taxes under the refundable earned income credit; negative taxes were truncated to zero for the analysis. The regression results are shown in table 1,[4] and the distribution of tax returns by the relationship of tax liability to the average in each income class is shown in table 2.

TABLE 1.—RESULTS OF REGRESSION ON EFFECTIVE TAX RATES

| Greater than 100 | 56.8 | [1] 77.5 |
| 100 to 75 | 8.8 | 12.0 |

[1] The percentage of returns with taxes greater than average is greater than 50 because (a) the distribution of taxes as a percentage of the average is skewed toward zero, as explained in footnote in the text, and (b) the regression equation used to estimate the average effective rate at each income level underestimates the actual mean because it is fit on the basis of the square of the deviation of each observation from the mean, rather than the deviation itself.

[2] Tax is 25 percent or less of the average effective rate for the income level, but greater than zero.

TAX REDUCTION DEVICES

The format for presentation of the results is the graphical technique first used by Pechman.[5] This graph shows first the distribution of effective tax rates by income class that would prevail if no deductions or exemptions whatever were permitted; then it shows the change due to reinstating each preferential feature one by one until the final result is tax liability under current law.

Figure 1 shows the effects of the individual tax features for the entire population. The shape of the diagram is much like the earlier computations by Pechman. The personal exemptions and personal credits in the law are found to reduce taxes significantly at the lower income levels, but to become progressively less important in a relative sense as income rises. Personal deductions have a large impact at all levels, including lower incomes where the standard deduction is prevalent. Tax preference items [6] excluded from the ordinary tax but subject to the minimum tax have a perceptible effect only at upper income levels; the maximum tax on earned income has a similar impact. Income splitting reduces taxes by the largest relative amounts at moderately high income levels, and less at the highest and lowest incomes. The refundable earned income credit reduces taxes at low income levels only.

The most striking feature of the chart, however, is probably the effect of the capital gains preference. While it has no perceptible effect on revenues below about $25,000 of comprehensive income, the exclusion of one-half of realized long term gains (plus the alternative tax) has a rapidly increasing effect until it is the second most important revenue reducing feature for the highest income returns. This significant role of capital gains preference in reducing taxes at the highest income levels has led many observers to conclude that this preference must play a leading role in cases of highly successful minimization of tax liability by upper income taxpayers.

Figure 2, which is drawn only for returns with tax liabilities within 5 percent of the average for each income level, would probably tend to reinforce this conclusion. It shows that for the average upper income taxpayer, the capital gains preference has a more limited impact than for all of those with high incomes. The other obvious shift at the upper income levels is the greater role for the maximum tax on earnings, indicating that the high income taxpayer with average liability receives a relatively large fraction of his income from labor. Below about $100,000 of income it is clear that the average taxpayer uses virtually no tax reduction devices beyond deductions and exemptions.

Figures 3 and 4 present taxes for two other subgroups of the population: those whose taxes are between 100 and 75 percent, and 75 and 50 percent of the average, respectively. For upper income returns in these groups, it is clear that the capital gains exclusion and alternative tax are of primary importance. These preferences reduce the effective tax rates of the highest income classes by twenty percentage points in the lower-taxed group—more than all itemized deductions. The maximum tax has less effect as effective tax rates fall, indicating that little of the income at these levels is earned from labor. Income splitting also becomes relatively less important for lower tax rate groups, while tax preference items other than capital gains become more important. The tax reduction devices used at income levels below about $100,000 are again restricted largely to the various itemized deductions.

Figures 5 and 6 show the tax reducing features used on returns with tax liabilities less than 25 percent of the average but still greater than zero, and on nontaxable returns. The results at upper incomes might come as something of a surprise—the important role of the capital gains preferences is drastically reduced. The overwhelming effect is that of personal deductions, which by themselves reduce effective tax rates by fifty percentage points or more at the highest income levels. The only other appreciable effect is that of capital gains, which is less than 10 percentage points for both groups. The dominance of personal deductions below $100,000 of income is virtually unchanged.

The foregoing results make it clear that different taxpayer groups with varying effective rates of tax make dramatically different use of different tax reduction devices. A remaining question is the composition of the personal deductions taken at different income and effective tax rate levels. Table 2 shows the percentage breakdown of itemized deductions among five classes: medical, charitable, interest, state and local taxes, and all other. The results indicate that the relative use of different itemized deductions also varies significantly by effective tax rate groupings.[7]

Comparisons among the effective tax rate classes can best be made by broad income groupings. Below about $20,000 of STI, there is no discernible shift among tax rate classes. Between about $20,000 and $200,000, the low effective tax rate group shows a greater relative use of medical, charitable and (with less consistency) miscellaneous deductions than tax returns with higher effective rates. The reliance on interest and state and local tax deductions is lower. Above $200,000, however, the low tax rate returns show distinctly greater relative use of interest and charitable deductions, and less of medical and state and local tax deductions; miscellaneous deductions are largely unchanged. Interest and charitable deductions are, of course, easily manipulable by the taxpayer to minimize tax liability.

CONCLUSIONS

The computations in this paper indicate that some qualification of earlier notions of the role of tax reduction devices may be in order. A view of the entire population indicates that preferences for realized long term capital gains have an impact second only to personal deductions on tax liabilities at the highest income levels. On tax returns with high incomes and very low tax liabilities, however, personal deductions play a far more important role. Capital gains preferences show up more strongly on returns with liabilities between one-half of the average and the average. For returns with taxes around the average, the maximum tax on earned income reduces liabilities most. At lower income levels, personal deductions are the major tax reduction feature.

An examination of the itemized personal deductions used to reduce taxes shows again that, the use of various devices changes with the degree of tax avoidance. Returns with low tax liability between about $20,000 and $200,000 of income make heavier relative use of deductions for medical expenses and charitable contributions than returns with the same incomes and higher taxes; at higher incomes, interest expense and charitable contribution deductions are more heavily used by returns with low effective tax rates.

The major implication of these findings is for tax policy with regard to leakages from the income tax base. If a major concern for policy is the total reduction of tax liabilities at upper income levels, then the capital gains preferences are virtually as important as personal deductions. If, on the other hand, the major concern is extreme cases of tax minimization, then most effort should be concentrated on personal deductions.

[3] "Total income" is defined as adjusted gross income plus excluded sick pay and moving expenses and the excluded half of long term capital gains.

[4] The distribution of effective tax rates is such that there is a maximum value (that which results from taking the standard deduction with no exclusions) but no minimum other than zero. Thus the distribution tends to be truncated at the highest possible tax rate, and the regression curve underestimates the average rate somewhat. The result here is that the group selected as paying approximately the average effective rate includes returns paying somewhat less, and the groups selected as paying less than average in fact pay even somewhat less than stated.

[6] Not including excluded long term capital gains.

[7] It is important to remember two factors in considering table 2: (1) The table shows the percentage breakdown of different types of deductions in total deductions; in the lower effective tax rate groups, however, the absolute amount of deductions is higher in any given income class than in the higher tax groups. (2) The table shows the total amount of each deduction claimed in each income class; certain types of deductions might be claimed in very large amounts but on few returns, leading to a small total.

ARCHBOLD TRACT SET FOR LUXURY PROJECT

(By Jerry Knight and Patricia Camp)

The largest piece of private property in the District of Columbia, the 40-acre John Archbold estate on Reservoir Road NW, will be turned into a multimillion-dollar luxury housing development by C. W. Murchison, Jr., the Texan who owns the Dallas Cowboys.

Officials of a company owned by Murchison said yesterday they have leased the estate, known as Hillandale, from Archbold and his family. The lease calls for payments to the Archbold family in "excess of $1 million a year" and reportedly includes "cost of living escalators" that will double the annual rental over its 99-year term.

A mixture of at least 300 detached and clustered houses, selling for $300,000 and up, will probably be built on the land, said John Williams of Hillandale Development Corp.

Murchison formed the company last month to develop the estate, a project that real estate industry sources estimate will cost at least $75 million and take several years to build.

A housing project that big would bring the city about $10 million a year in additional real estate and income taxes, said J. Kirkwood White, assistant D.C. planning director.

It would also bring additional traffic, people and controversy to a neighborhood where any proposed development usually produces outcries.

The estate, covering almost 16 blocks on the western edge of Georgetown, is already zoned for housing, so the developer will have few administrative hurdles to clear before beginning work.

Hillandale is a few blocks away from the Foxhall Road estate of Nelson Rockefeller, where another developer plans to build about 125 houses in the $300,000 to $400,000 price range.

D.C. City Council member Polly Shackleton (D-Ward 3), who represents the neighborhood, said yesterday she hopes the development of Hillandale will include "the same kind of regulation that the Rockefeller estate came under."

Rozansky and Kay, developers of the Rockefeller property, agreed to let neighbors participate in planning the the project. "I would hope that Murchison would do the same thing and work with the community," added Shackleton.

Williams said the developers already plan to "meet with interested parties, public and private, so we have a project that is economically feasible and solves more problems than it creates."

The Archbold and Rockefeller family fortunes flow from the same oil wells. John D. Archbold was the original partner of John D. Rockefeller in the Standard Oil Company.

Archbold's daughter Anne—who resumed the family name after she was divorced—built Hillandale's eight-bedroom mansion, in the style of a 14th century Italian villa, starting in 1921. She gave away part of the property to form Glover-Archbold Park, which now abuts Hillandale on the north and west sides. On the south, the estate fronts on Reservoir Road for about four blocks. And 39th Street, from Reservoir north past S Street NW forms the eastern edge of the property.

The land now is owned by Archbold Investment Co., a family company headed by John Archbold, the son of Anne, who lives in the house when he is not at his country home in Upperville, Va., at his English estate, or traveling.

Williams said the developers have not decided what to do with the sprawling stucco villa. In addition to leasing the land from the Archbolds, the developers paid $600,000 for the mansion, outbuildings and a gatehouse now occupied by socialite Page Lee Hufty, a member of the Archbold family.

Under the agreement, Archbold can live in the house for two years, while the developers are planning their project. Hufty can stay in her residence for a year.

The others owners of Archbold Investment Co., who will share in the $1 million-a-year income from the lease, are John Archbold's four daughters, Anne Archbold Collins, Moira Archbold O'Connor, Lucie Schelling Archbold and Jennifer Archbold.

Richard Mullens, the attorney who represented Archbold in the transaction, said, "The principal factor that prompted him to do something about the property at this time was the District of Columbia property tax."

Mullens said the house was "just too costly." With an assessed value of $5 million, the highest on the city's tax rolls, the taxes on the property last year were $65.000.

Taxes were also the reason Archbold decided to lease the estate rather than sell it, Mullens said.

If the property were sold, capital gains taxes almost 50 percent of the money. Income from the lease will be taxed as ordinary income, presumably at lower rates. The $1 million-a-year rental amounts to an 8.5 percent return on a $12 million investment, the cash price upon which the sale was reportedly based.

The Archbolds also have an unusual two-year option allowing them, in effect, to force Murchison to buy the property, for as much as $14 million, depending on when the option is exercised.

Leasing the land creates major legal headaches for the developers, said Washington attorney E. David Harrison, who represents the Murchison interests, because land leases have never been used for residential developments in the District of Columbia.

Building houses on leased land is common practice in some areas, including Baltimore, but D.C. laws might have to be changed to make the Hillandale project feasible, the attorney said.

In another major development in Northwest Washington, California builder Dwight Mize recently signed a contract to purchase McLean Gardens, a 723-unit apartment complex on Wisconsin Avenue, and convert it to condominiums.

In Northeast, two developers have purchased 25 arces on Michigan Avenue from Trinity College and plan to build 534 town houses there.●

WEALTH OF A NATION: FOCUSING ON THE FUTURE

HON. JAMES G. MARTIN

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, this year, for the second consecutive year, my office sponsored an essay contest for juniors and seniors in high schools in North Carolina's Ninth Congressional District.

After preselection by officials at public and private high schools, a panel of independent judges selected a winner and two runners-up from the entries.

The judges were extremely complimentary of the quality of the writing, along with the degree of research and thought which went into the essays.

The winner of this year's essay contest is 17-year-old Paul Madsen, son of Mr. and Mrs. Alan Madsen of Charlotte, N.C.

Paul is a junior at Olympic High School in Mecklenburg County.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, I call to your attention the essay of Paul Madsen and know you join with me in extending congratulations to this leader of the future:

WEALTH OF A NATION: FOCUSING ON THE FUTURE

(By Paul Madsen)

America—it might be considered a relatively insignificant appellation until one considers the enormous impact the United States of America has made on modern civilization. Within this nation lie the roots of democratic capitalism which have such a profound effect upon global society. Never before in the history of mankind has there been so much technological progress than during the relatively short two hundred years America has been in existence. The wealth of the United States is synthesized by its capitalistic way of life; and it is this economic entity, directed by the perpetual influence of human nature, that will determine the ultimate course taken by American society.

How does capitalism function in the economy of the United States? Capitalism can be described as synonymous to the wealth of the United States; and America's wealth, in turn, endures a symbiotic relationship to its economy. So, in essence, it can be safely assumed that capitalism directly supports America's economic system. Without capitalistic drives the economy of the United States would slowly deflate, like a leaky balloon. Capitalism encourages competition and innovative technological development simply because it appeals to an enduring, typically human pursuit—greed. Therefore, capitalism is a predominantly functioning factor in U.S. economic developments.

However, unchecked capitalism has a devastating potential for destruction. As is clearly visible during modern times, America's primary economic influence is getting out of hand. Industrial giants, encouraged by America's democratic, free-enterprise system and spurred by capitalist sentiments, are now largely responsible for the exploitation of human and natural resources which the United States presently encounters. Inflation and unemployment thrive, the stock market falls and pollution contaminates the environment as a result of corporate ventures. Theoretically, America's typical middle-class laborer produces more than he is paid for. Consequently, the United States is transforming into a giant junk yard whose goods eventually end up useless or obsolete from lack of quality and efficiency. Ironically, the United States Government supports such exploitations simply to keep the economy from collapsing. The end results of the process are pollution and similar environmental and economic disasters. A solution is desperately needed to thwart "corporate" capitalism.

The ultimate future of American economy lies then in a form of controlled expansion regulated by the government of the United States. President Carter's energy plan is a prime example of such a system and its complete or even partial adoption will surely open doors. At the same time, however, as governmental influence increases, the creative, technical atmosphere fostered by capitalism could suffer. The strengths of capitalism may, ironically, sustain its partial decomposition. Yet, the benefits of modifying capitalism in its present form considerably outweigh the possible detrimental effects imposed by its control. Therefore, because of present economic tendencies promoted by rampant, "corporate" capitalism, an increase in governmental influence upon United States economy is surely imminent.

America's social behavior is largely influenced by its economy. Social patterns in the U.S. are strongly marked by Marx's theory of Economic Determinism. Thus, by the principle of the syllogism, it can be assumed that capitalism also plays a major role in determining the course of social trend in the United States. In fact, democratic capitalism is fast becoming a way of life for most American citizens. James D. Forman describes the evolution of capitalism:

"Capitalism was born not made. Without benefit of disgruntled intellectuals or revolutionaires, it simply grew as a way of doing business, and ultimately as a way of life." [1]

So, early capitalism was nourished by the freedom of a democratic society and it still remains largely unchecked.

What does this economically-centered way of life mean for the average American? It simply means that he will have to endure the effects of present economic tendencies or lower his standard of living. Present sociological trends in the United States indicate sentiments linked to the theory of rising expectations. The United States middle class has been exposed to the highest standard of living it has ever experienced. Yet, this class has such a limited scope that it expects living standards to rise consistently. Of course, they will continue to rise only as long as corporations exploit the economy of the United States. These exploitations also bring the subsequent demise of established society. Today's typical teenager is strong evidence of the influence of present capitalistic trends upon society. Society is disorganized and so he seeks an escape through drugs and alcohol. A solution lies in the enlightenment and intellectual development of America's middle class through improvements in the general quality of education. Therefore, U.S. governmental control is necessary to the stabilization of United States economy, but it is also essential to the creation of the rational social behavior patterns that promote beneficial growth.

Most American citizens would tend to think that an increase in government influence upon their lives implies socialist or communist motives—on the contrary. Controlled expansion will provide for a more efficient capitalistic, social-economic state. Capitalism thrives on the constant threat of communism. Americans feel intimidated and consequently divert their energies toward beneficial development. The United States need fear no interruption by either socialism or communism if it exhibits tendencies toward an increasingly structured capitalist nation. Capitalism must not be totally eradicated because it has more growth prospect than any other economic system.

Common problems such as drug abuse, crime, vandalism and poverty are all typical of the destructive nature which the disorganized, economically dependent society of the U.S. has instilled. Governmental organization will invariably enable these problems to correct themselves. The complete process will take time, perhaps as long as it took capitalism in its present form to develop, but the ultimate rewards will be great.

Politics will naturally have a fundamental influence upon the future of American economic and social trends. Liberalism is essential to the structured capitalism the United States must pursue. The trite advice which proceeds from the expression "nothing ventured—nothing gained" is quite pertinent to America's present situation. United States citizens are already witnessing the downfall of conservative sentiments in the corporately-stressed Republican party. Conservative attitudes provide for no organized development of technical processes. So, in the long run, Conservative attitudes cannot survive within the political spectrum of the United States.

The development of American society can be critically employed to evaluate the eventual outcome of the supreme political struggle which the United States presently encounters—The Cold War. The Cold War is constantly nourished by fear and instability. These fears are largely created by the prospect of mutually-assured destruction. Most Americans probably realize that the economic stability enjoyed by Soviet communism is fast leaving the United States behind in the arms race. America's unsteady economy prevents the successful deterrence of Soviet aggression. Thus, controlled capitalistic economic expansion, may put a damper on Soviet hostilities by restoring some confidence in the American people.

The cold war is also rapidly transforming into an economic superiority contest. The conflict is currently based upon the question of economic stability, the victor being the one who can manufacture a surplus of arms and still maintain its composure. Situations in the Middle East are typical of current Cold War strategies. The United States sells Phantom jets to Israel so the Israelis can vanquish the Egyptians in their Russian-built tanks. America will eventually lose such a battle with communism simply because communism creates a more efficient society. The final solution lies not only in the structuring of capitalism in the United States, however, but also in the technological development of "backward" nations. These nations fall as easy prey to the initial appeal which communism inspires. Therefore, only the development of these threatened "backward" nations will sufficiently hinder the expansion of communism.

The wealth of the United States, embodied in a governed capitalist economy, holds many prospects for the future. International trade markets will most assuredly result from the policy of controlled expansion that America must pursue. Tariffs and embargoes will become extinct restrictions as detrimental "corporate" capitalism, which discourages international cooperation, is eradicated. Technological advance is also sure to result from the efficient and highly scientific atmosphere installed by the emergence of rational social behavior and labor-specialization. The quality of education must be improved to create the intellectual capacity and wisdom needed to efficiently expand such national and global development.

The free world must unite both economically and politically in a limited capacity to thwart the spread of communism which threatens America's prosperity and growth and subsequently the world's. The Cold War will gradually dissipate if the United States simply stabilizes its economy and maintains an equal if not superior military status toward the Soviets. Cold War hostilities will gradually dissipate as both sides realize the futility of such conflict and national and international interest predominate. As John K. Galbraith says:

"Whatever the peculiarities of the Russian temperament or the communist commitment to its faith, there is no reason to think that these include a predilection for high temperature incineration." [2]

In fact, the future of world civilization may involve a fusion of the three most predominant economic systems in existence today—capitalism, communism, and socialism. The United States is strong evidence of the benefits capitalism contributes to society, and it is up to American government to provide for its efficient control and development.

In conclusion, America's financial, human, and natural resources coupled with the strong influence of "corporate" capitalism and a growing liberal viewpoint will necessitate the development of a structured capitalist economy. The processes involved in such a task will substantially influence the political, social, and economic tendencies of the entire globe. It is certainly evident that the future of mankind depends on the wisdom with which he develops his technology and economic way of life. As the United States has a profound global influence, it is valid to propose that America's efficient economic development will undoubtedly exert a magnificent force upon the ultimate future of man and his society.

QUESTIONNAIRE RESULTS

HON. CHALMERS P. WYLIE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to bring to the attention of my colleagues the results of my most recent questionnaire mailed postal patron to the residents of Ohio's 15th Congressional District.

I have found this opinion sampling technique to be highly informative and a most useful tool for me in determining how to represent my constituents in Congress.

The results are as follows:

TESTIMONY OF THE CAMBODIAN PEOPLE—PART 2

HON. JOHN B. ANDERSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, today I am placing in the RECORD, for the Members' information, two more interviews with Cambodian refugees:

INTERVIEW WITH CAMBODIAN REFUGEE IN BURIRAM, THAILAND, CONDUCTED BY AMERICAN EMBASSY OFFICER IN JUNE, 1978

ACCOUNT OF SOURCE C*

Source C, a former barber, arrived in Thailand March 1, 1978, from Siem Reap Province. After April 1975, he was ordered to become a farmer like everyone else. Source C is about 28. His account follows:

Conditions of Life in Democratic Kampuchea. "I lived in a village of 550 people in Siem Reap Province. About half of the people were 'Old Cambodians' and half were 'New Cambodians' (not under Khmer Rouge before April 1975). During the rainy season, we worked in the fields and in the dry season, we worked digging canals and building dams. In my village, the rice crop decreased year by year since 1975. I think that inadequate fertilizer was responsible for the decreases.

"We ate twice each day. For a few months in 1975, we had rice each day. After that, we received only porridge, but not enough. We received about the same amounts until I escaped."

System of Administration and Discipline. "We had to attend weekly meetings in the village. In the meetings, the village chief only talked about production and the need to work hard to build dams." The 'Old Cambodians' could give suggestions, but the 'New Cambodians' could not.

"If the 'New People' were late for work, sick or did not have permission to do something, the group chief would tell the village chief, who would call you in and give you a reprimand the first and second time. If you stole a little food from someone, the same thing happened. If a 'New Cambodian' raised a potato near his house and ate it without getting the permission of the group chief, you would be reprimanded the first and second time. The third time you would be 'sent to Angka Leu' (executed).

"If you were a 'New Cambodian' and had problems, too much work, or if someone was taking advantage of you, you had no recourse. 'Old Cambodians' could tell the group chief. If you were beaten up by an 'Old Cambodian', it was too bad. The 'New People' were always wrong and the 'Old' always right. If the group chief hit you, you could not complain to the village chief, because the group chief would tell the village chief that you were a 'New Person', did not like to work, and do not like the new regime."

Executions. "I decided to escape because the Khmer Rouge wanted to kill me. I was assigned to work far from my village. One night eight of us who were 'New Cambodians' were invited to 'attend a meeting'. When we arrived, the Khmer Rouge ordered us to be tied up. The seven others were tied, but I escaped and ran away. Of the seven, three were former soldiers and four were simple farmers. I did not understand precisely why we were called. There were many such meetings, but usually when we attended we were not tied up. I had heard of this happening before—people were called in the night and then executed.

"I learned from neighbors that I was to be killed. I asked, 'Why?' because I had done nothing wrong. The neighbors told me only that people were being killed. Earlier, I was walking around and I overheard the Khmer Rouge tell 'Old Cambodians': 'We do not trust the Lon Nol people and do not like to keep them.'

"I had two brothers and a brother-in-law who were killed. My brothers were 26 and 24 in 1975. They had not been conscripted in the Lon Nol Army, but their names had been registered. The Khmer Rouge found their names on GKR lists and killed them just two months after the takeover in 1975. My brother-in-law was also killed, but he was a former soldier.

"At that time, the Khmer Rouge assembled all the soldiers, telling the soldiers that they would 'be retrained.' But in fact they were executed. Many people saw the execution sites. I myself saw an execution site at Kog Dong. There were only bones, perhaps 400 skeletons there. At the time, I was assigned to work there. The soldiers' wives were not harmed."

*(The name of the individual refugee who provided this account has been excised to protect the identity of family members or friends still in Cambodia.)

INTERVIEW WITH CAMBODIAN REFUGEE IN BURIRAM, THAILAND, CONDUCTED BY AMERICAN EMBASSY OFFICER IN JUNE, 1978

ACCOUNT OF YIM SOT RONNACHIT*

Yim Sot Ronnachit, 16, completed six years of schooling in his native Siem Reap before the Khmer Rouge took over. After the takeover, he moved to Pouk District, Siem Reap with his family, his mother, father and six brothers and sisters. He escaped to Thailand in March 1, 1978. His story follows:

"The Khmer Rouge ordered us to work in the rice fields. My father had been a fish-seller in Siem Reap. At first, we lived together, but after ten days in Pouk, my eighteen year old brother and I were sent about ten kilometers away to work. We worked in the rainy season as farmers. In the dry season, we built canals and dug ditches. We worked from 0600 to 1200 and then from 1300 to 1700. During the dry season, we also worked at night from 1900 to 2100.

"During the dry season, we received rice twice a day. This was not enough. In the rainy season, we only received rice porridge twice a day, one tin of rice (250 grams) to make porridge for ten persons. This also was not enough. The rations were about the same from 1975 on.

"People got sick often because of lack of food. The sick went to the hospital where they received medicine made from roots and bark. Most people came back.

"My brother and I stayed in that place to work until 1977, when we were called back to the village where my family lived (to see our father and mother). After a few days with our family, we and 26 other families, 78 persons in all, were told we would move to another place, Kothasuous, also in Pouk District.

"On the way to Kothasuous, we were escorted by eight Khmer Rouge soldiers. After five days of working in Kothasuous, we were ordered to go to another place near the Lake Tonle Sap to plant rice. The Khmer Rouge soldiers said, 'Let's go all together about five kilometers'.

"After we walked about one kilometer to Kan Sang Pi Doeun, the Khmer Rouge said, 'Everybody must stop here. All the men should go ahead to build houses.' After about one hour, the Khmer Rouge took small groups, about ten or fifteen persons, at a time, all in family groups. The Khmer Rouge would say, 'Let's go to a new place. While waiting, the women and children were very frightened and were crying.

"Then my family was ordered to go along with another three families. We were taken by three Khmer Rouge to a place where there were twelve others. The Khmer Rouge pointed guns at us and tied the entire group of us together. There was one old man, one male adult and the rest were women and children. We could see that the others had all been killed. I saw the body of my father in the heap. The Khmer Rouge said, 'You will be killed, because you are wrong.' We were ordered to sit on the ground, then the Khmer Rouge began to hit us with poles and hoes. The Khmer Rouge beat five or six people before me. Then they hit me on the back of my head and on my back. I fainted. They thought I was dead.

"I spent another night in the forest. My head hurt very badly. Even now when it is hot, I have a pain from my neck into my head. After two nights, I saw a man from my village. He told me of another group which was going to be killed. We decided to flee together. I didn't know where we were going. We got a little rice from some 'New Cambodians' we met. After two days of walking, we met two others we knew, both farmers whom the Khmer Rouge had wanted to kill. We walked in the forest for two weeks before arriving in Thailand March 1.

"I cannot imagine any reason the Khmer Rouge wanted to kill 27 families. We were 'New Cambodians' (not under the Khmer Rouge prior to April 1975) from the town and the Khmer Rouge don't like people from the town. When I was working in the rice fields with my brother, I heard the Khmer Rouge say, 'All New People are the enemy.' All 77 who were killed were 'New Cambodians.' Neither I nor my family had ever previously had any trouble with the Khmer Rouge.

"All the members of my family were killed. They were: Yim Khun Nung, 43, my father; Seng Cham, 44, my mother; Yim Sot Noren, 20, my brother; Yim Sot Ronnachot, 13, my brother; Yim Sot Nisay, 10, my brother; Yim Sot Moniki, 9, my brother; and Yim Sot Seihavirak, 6, my brother."●

DEALING WITH THE ENERGY CRISIS

HON. RONALD M. MOTTL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to include in today's RECORD a letter I received from the school board in North Royalton, Ohio.

With Congress still wrestling with the energy crisis, it is refreshing to see that some Americans are taking the bull by the horns and coming up with their own solutions.

I think the school board and school officials of North Royalton deserve the thanks of this Congress for their patriotic actions.

The letter follows:

NORTH ROYALTON CITY SCHOOLS,
North Royalton, Ohio, July 25, 1978.

Hon. RONALD MOTTL,
Congressional District of Ohio,
U.S. House of Representatives.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MOTTL: As president of the N. Royalton Board of Education I would like to report to you about the small things we are doing in our school district.

1. We have conducted an energy audit of one of our elementary schools and corrected all and any energy losing equipment and space.

2. The Appalachian Exploration Inc. whom we signed an agreement for an oil and gas lease started to dig today, July 25, 1978 and is expected to hit gas sometime this week. This school system will naturally begin to profit from this lease.

North Royalton City Schools is proud that it is doing the very best possible to make itself self sufficient in this energy age.

We will be honored if you can report our efforts to the Congress, the Departments of Energy and Education as well as the President of the U.S.

Sincerely,

FELINO V. BARNES, M.D.●

MILWAUKEE JOURNAL, PORTLAND OREGONIAN, READING EAGLE OPPOSE FOREIGN AID CUTS

HON. MATTHEW F. McHUGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, the foreign assistance appropriations bill will soon come before the House for consideration. As every Member is aware by now, numerous amendments will be offered to reduce funding and to restrict how our assistance may be used in a variety of ways.

I am opposed to these amendments, Mr. Speaker, and I have been encouraged by the fact that so many thoughtful and responsible newspapers across the Nation have indicated their opposition to them as well. For example, the Milwaukee Journal in a recent editorial argued that the United States should not attempt to impose political conditions on our contributions to the international financial institutions since they were never intended to serve as instruments of U.S. short-term foreign policy goals.

The Portland Oregonian elaborated on this point by observing that a substantial reduction in our foreign aid would prove harmful to a system of international agreements that we ourselves originally fostered.

Finally, the Reading, Pa., Eagle made a more direct point in a recent editorial. It pointed out that AID and the IFIs spend much of the foreign aid funds we provide on goods and services in the United States, and suggested that we should not overlook the beneficial domestic consequences of foreign aid.

For the benefit of those Members who may not have seen these editorials, I am including them in the RECORD at this time:

FOREIGN AID'S MISGUIDED CRITICS

Today's great disparities between rich and poor nations are the seeds for tomorrow's global conflicts. Over the years, the US has wisely voiced the need to help lessen those gaps. Now it has a particularly good opportunity to match its words with dollars.

The House soon will take up a $7.35 billion foreign assistance bill. Of special importance is a $2.62 billion appropriation within the legislation representing America's promised share of support for the World Bank, the Inter-American Development Bank, the Asian Development Bank and the African Development Fund. These important multinational lending institutions play a vital role in providing assistance to solid economic development projects in the poorer countries of the globe.

These institutions' criteria for lending are not based on politics but on the economic viability of the proposed project. Will the benefits outweigh the investment? Will the project pay? This kind of approach not only makes sense financially but it also fosters the right kind of development psychology in an underdeveloped country. There are no political strings attached to these loans. The recipient nation is beholden to no rich, industrialized country in particular.

It is in the best interest of the US to encourage this kind of multinational activity. Regrettably, that view might not prevail in the House. One reason is a stinginess ill befitting a powerful nation. Although the US contributes a smaller fraction of its national wealth to foreign assistance than do many industrialized nations, some House critics still want to slash support for these international banks. Such a step would be tragic since the amount already is a pared down version of the administration's original reasonable request of $3.5 billion. And Congress already is in arrears in paying to the banks what it promised in past years.

A second problem is the desire to place severe restrictions on how the American money is used. Some critics don't want the banks to grant loans to countries that restrict human rights; others don't want the institutions to support projects that compete with US products; and still others want to bar loans specifically to such countries as Cuba, Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos, Angola, Mozambique and Uganda.

Such restrictions would be quite proper if this were bilateral US foreign aid meant to support specific short term foreign policy goals. But these lending institutions are specifically designed to be free of politics—and for good reason.

The US should not try to impose its narrow desires on these banks any more than should France, England, Japan or Saudi Arabia, who also contribute funds. If every country attempted to have its way, the banks simply could not function—and the world would be a more explosive place.

CASE FOR FOREIGN AID

California's Proposition 13 precedent in tax slashing has had a variety of impacts. One of the first and most serious of these has been congressional whittling on foreign aid legislation. The mood in Congress has been apparently to impress the folks back home by a show of frugality at the expense of the nation's foreign relations.

The foreign aid issue is expected to come to the floor of the House of Representatives after the July 4 recess. The House Appropriations Committee cut more than $1 billion off the total the Carter administration requested for the Agency for International Development (AID), International Financial Institutions (IFI), including the World Bank, and military credit and sales. There has been some talk in Congress of killing the entire package.

That would be a great disservice, not only to the poor nations of the world, but to the U.S. national interest as well.

This country has been campaigning abroad for an increase in foreign aid on the part of the world's most developed countries, many of them U.S. allies. An abrupt cessation of or substantial cut in U.S. foreign aid would be harmful to the system of international agreements fostered by this country for the strengthening of Third World economies, stimulation of trade and alleviation of hunger in the poorest countries.

For example, the United States was instrumental in creating the agencies in the IFI as a means of encouraging other developed countries to share in assistance to developing nations. A congressional rebuke to foreign aid would hurt that program, perhaps cripple it.

The issues are expected to be debated for several days in the House. Members will probably try to exhibit on the floor their response to Proposition 13 in the form of reductions in foreign aid. Some reductions are tolerable, but the bill should not be gutted to the extent that the product would harm U.S. influence and interests abroad.

AID MONEY SPENT AT HOME

The Senate has just voted a 5 percent across-the-board reduction in "foreign aid," which poses, according to President Carter, a threat to the good repuation that the United States enjoys around the world.

The echoes, moreover, may be heard not just in some far away place, but right here in our own backyard.

In a manner of speaking, "foreign aid" is a misnomer for the federal program under which goods and services are bought in the United States and sent overseas. It is true, of course, that recipient countries are the beneficiaries, but they get the value only. The buck stops at home; we keep the money.

During the past year, for example, the Agency for International Development spent $17,182 right here in Reading, out of a total of more than $23.2 million worth of goods and services that it bought in Pennsylvania.

Of the Berks total, $3,109 went to Carpenter Steel Company; $7,110 to Kaweeki Berylco Inc.; $4,456 to Mercator Corp.; and $2,507 to Rockwell International.

The sums spent here are dwarfed by those in nearby counties: $8.3 million in Lehigh: $1.2 million in Montgomery, and $728,000 in Chester.

AID explains that the commodities and services that it buys are used to help stimulate economic growth in less developed countries, many of which supply raw material for U.S. factories and, also, are export markets for U.S. products.

Of the statewide total of $23.2 million, more than $3.6 million to Pennsylvania farmers and food processors for grain and other agricultural commodities for developing countries under the Food for Peace program.

Multinational development institutions supported by the United States, such as the World Bank, also purchase goods and services in the United States, but accurate figures on that are not available.

In addition to humanitarian reasons, the United States supports a foreign aid program to combat problems in less developed countries that do or could influence the peace, security, and well-being of the United States.

Among these Third World problems are massive hunger that causes political upheaval, skyrocketing population growth that nullifies economic gains, lack of job opportunities that triggers migration to affluent countries, depletion of natural resources like fresh water and arable lands, and environmental degradation.

That the effort also bolsters our domestic economy must not be overlooked.●

ELIMINATION OF GLOBAL HUNGER

HON. HAROLD S. SAWYER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, the international community has repeatedly reaffirmed its commitment to eliminate global hunger and malnutrition. We in the United States strongly subscribe to this action and we have taken affirmative steps to help others who are in need. Not only must we address this accelerating problem through the attention of governmental efforts, but we must enlist the support and assistance of all religious, social, and other private organizations to effectively reduce world hunger.

In furtherance of this policy, I am pleased to call the attention of my colleagues to the action taken by the Christian Reformed Synod of North America on June 26, 1978.

Their declaration follows:

DECLARATION ON WORLD HUNGER

Recognizing God as the Creator of all things, and man as his steward;

Confessing that God breaks into the lives of his people with his Word and Spirit, training them in patterns of love and justice;

Finding in God's Word his liberality for men and the whole creation, and protective laws for the defenseless and underprivileged;

Remembering the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, who entered poverty so that others might become rich; and

Listening to God's call to his people to disciple all nations and to practice love and justice in the earth;—the synod of the Christian Reformed Church acknowledges that the alleviation of hunger at home and abroad is an integral part of our Christian responsibility, and asks that all members of the Christian Reformed Church devote themselves to gratitude, compassion, repentance, and justice as they respond to world hunger with a ministry of word and deed.●

SOVIETS SUBJECT PHILADELPHIA SISTER TO OUTRAGEOUS ORDEAL

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw my colleagues' attention to an abhorrent experience endured by Sister Gloria Coleman during her recent trip to the Soviet Union.

Sister Gloria is coordinator of interfaith and ecumenical affairs for the Cardinal's Commission on Human Relations of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia. She also serves as chairman of Philadelphia's Interreligious Task Force on Soviet Jewry.

During her visit to the U.S.S.R., Sister Gloria met with both Jewish and non-Jewish activists, to let them know that Christians in the United States are dedicated to the cause of human rights. While she was waiting at the Moscow airport for her airplane to return home, Sister Gloria was forced to undergo a body search by an airport employee in a locked room, after which the notes she had kept of her trip and addresses of Soviet Jews were taken from her. Airport officials refused to provide her with a document stating that the materials had been confiscated.

I would like to commend Sister Gloria for her courageous work on behalf of Soviet activists. I would also like to share with my colleagues the following article, which describes Sister Gloria's horrifying experience:

[From the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, June 30, 1978]

NUN SAYS RUSSIANS SEIZED NOTES, FILM

(By Paula Herbut)

A Roman Catholic nun concerned about the plight of Soviet Jews charged yesterday that notes she kept of a recent 16-day trip to the Soviet Union, including addresses of Soviet Jews, were confiscated at the Moscow Airport before she returned home.

Sister Gloria Coleman of Philadelphia said yesterday that she handed over the material after she was locked in a room at the airport and subjected to a body search Sunday morning before her departure.

Films of the trip taken by another nun, Sister Ann Gillen of Chicago, executive director of the national Interreligious Task Force on Soviet Jewry, also were confiscated, Sister Gloria said.

"I insisted I was a tourist. There was no reason for a body search," she said in a press conference at Jewish Community Relations Council offices at 260 S. 15th st., Philadelphia. "My objection was that I had no one there to witness it (the search)."

"It was obvious we had no rights at the time we were being questioned and being searched. There was a feeling of powerlessness," she said. "All the laws were being made on the spot for their purposes."

Sister Gloria is coordinator of interfaith and ecumenical affairs with the Cardinal's Commission on Human Relations of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Philadelphia and Philadelphia chairman of the Interreligious Task Force on Soviet Jewry.

She said that she and Sister Ann unsuccessfully requested a document stating that the material and films had been confiscated. She said she filed complaints on Monday with the U.S. State Department's Soviet Desk and Office of Human Rights and Human Affairs.

Her luggage was separated and searched, Sister Gloria said, and she was asked into a room where she was to be searched by a woman employe at the airport. After entering, she decided to leave, she said. But when she turned to the door, the woman locked and bolted it, the nun said.

Sister Gloria said she believes she and Sister Ann were singled out because they ignored several of the group tours made to go off by themselves, sometimes to sightsee and sometimes to visit Soviet Jewish activists.

"I wanted to bring some hope to them (the activists)," she said. "I wanted them to know that Christians were interested in human rights being denied . . . Whether it will be for other Christians or Jews, we're all together "

The two visited about 30 activists or the families of activists who are in prison, all but one of them Jewish, Sister Gloria said. Most have been trying to obtain emigration rights.

One was Ida Nudel, whom they visited 10 days before she was convicted of "malicious hooliganism" stemming from her attempts to emigrate to Israel, Sister Gloria said. She said Mrs. Nudel's Moscow apartment was kept under surveillance by agents who followed the trio when they left.

Mrs. Nudel, a 47-year-old economist, is called the "guardian angel" by imprisoned Soviet activists because of her aid to prisoners and their families. She was sentenced on June 21 to four years in a prison camp in Siberia. Convicted the same day on the same charge was Jewish activist Vladimir Slepak, a 50-year-old electronics engineer who received five years.

"There is obviously a crackdown" by the Soviet government, "an attempt (to break) the back of the (Soviet activist) movement," Sister Gloria said. "The atmosphere was very tight, very tense."●

AN INADEQUATE DIAGNOSIS

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, it is a sad day in this Nation when a longtime, intimate adviser to the President of the United States has to resign his position of public trust because of a manifest abuse of his professional status as a psychiatrist-physician. The situation created by Dr. Peter Bourne, who falsified a prescription for a mood-altering drug to be used by a member of the White House staff, cries out for attention.

Mr. Charles Seib of the Washington Post relates that there is more to the story in his July 26 article. More questions have been raised than have been answered both by the press and Mr. Jody Powell. We have two examples of abuse. Is there further drug abuse on the White House staff? Why did the Post's executive editor, Ben Bradlee, sit on the story about Peter Bourne snorting cocaine rather than unleashing his ever-so-efficient Watergate bloodhounds? What was the personal lifestyle of the White House staffers that prompted the so-called need for such drugs? What bad dreams was Mr. Bourne trying to assuage for his young White House friend with his quaalude treatment?

Alexandr Solzhenitsyn's reference to Western decadence is all the more poignant now. How is this ugly incident being played by the Soviet controlled press?

At one point in Mr. Carter's 1976 Presidential campaign, a need for some quick "prop-up" money led his campaign staff to seek the fund raising assistance of acid-rock concert, drug culture types. Are the seeds of that peculiar decision coming to fruition?

Mr. Nixon had his flakey staff people. Mr. Carter had his Lance and his Bourne. The American people will not swallow the shallow placebo offered by Mr. Carter's Press Secretary, Jody Powell, nor Ben Bradlee's tranquilizing excuses.

The Charles Seib column follows:

[From The Washington Post, July 26, 1978]

THE COCAINE INCIDENT: THERE'S MORE TO THE STORY

(By Charles B. Seib)

Dr. Peter Bourne left the White House to an old refrain: He was lynched by President Carter's enemies, who were abetted by the press.

Bourne resigned after it was disclosed that he had signed a prescription for a much-abused drug made out to a fictitious person. That surely was an unseemly thing for the president's adviser on drug abuse to do. But Bourne told the president in his letter of resignation that he really was a good fellow and the real villians were "those who seek to hurt you through my disparagement."

"I know clearly recognize" he said, "that I am an instrument through which others attempt to bring disfavor to you."

Such nonsense can be partly excused as the distraught maundering of a man whose world has just crashed. But it has a familiar ring, recalling the less precipitous but no less self-righteous departure of Bert Lance less than a year ago.

If Bourne believed what he said, he was kidding himself. The prescription caper was news. Any newspaper that suppressed it would deserve to have its First Amendment shredded.

It is true the coverage got strident; it always does when the press goes after misbehavior in high places. But once that luckless woman was arrested for trying to pick up the Quaaludes, there was only one way the story could go.

Having retained my membership in the Society of Militant Journalists, I must go on to say that there were several aspects of the story that the press should feel queasy about. To wit:

An important element in Bourne's decision to quit undoubtedly was a sensational follow-up to the prescription story—a report that, at a party thrown last December by a group favoring the legalization of marijuana, Bourne not only smoked marijuana but also used cocaine, a very illegal and very expensive drug. The party was a big one, attended by at least 600 people It was in an upstairs bedroom off limits to the bulk of the crowd, the story goes, that Bourne used the cocaine.

That bit of news was broken by Jack Anderson on ABC television the morning after The Washington Post's story on the phony prescription.

Bourne resigned later that day, and the next morning The Post gave the cocaine-snorting story prominent front-page display. It said Anderson's report had been substantiated by "a witness interviewed by The Washington Post."

Anderson's report and The Post's confirmation and expansion of it shared a defect: They didn't tell the whole story.

Anderson's broadcast was based on information supplied by one of his reporters, identified in The Post's story as Gary Cohn. Anderson did not tell his viewers that Cohn had been at the party, although not up in the bedroom, and that he had heard about the cocaine incident at that time.

After the prescription story broke, Cohn told Anderson what he knew, and Anderson directed him to get statements from witnesses. When those were obtained, Anderson went on the air with the story.

Now about that "witness interviewed by The Washington Post" on whom The Post's story mainly relied. The witness was, in fact, a Post reporter who had attended the December party and who said he saw Bourne snort cocaine through a rolled piece of currency, as is the fashion. Two other Post people were in the bedroom, which must have been a crowded one, at the historic moment, but apparently they did not supply material for The Post story.

Anderson and Ben Bradlee, executive editor of The Post, have explanations for their failure to reveal their reporters' special connection with the story.

Anderson says that since Cohn wasn't actually in the bedroom there was no need to mention that he was at the party. He says that he felt it was more important, in the two minutes of air time he had, to put the story in balance by noting some of the good things Bourne had done while at the White House.

Had Cohn been upstairs and a witness to the cocaine incident, Anderson added, he would have mentioned him on the air.

Bradlee says he is not troubled by The Post's failure to tell its readers that the witness it interviewed was one of its own reporters. "He gave us the information under a pledge of confidentiality, as news sources often do," he says. "Since we couldn't use his name, there was no point in identifying him as a Post reporter."

Well, maybe. But by not disclosing that their reporters were aware of the cocaine-sniffing months ago, both Anderson and The Post avoided an awkward news-business question: If the incident is such big news now, why didn't their reporters consider it news last December? Bourne was the president's drug-abuse adviser then, and cocaine was a highly illicit drug.

Although it is water long since over the dam, both Bradlee and Anderson say that if they had known what their reporters knew last December they would have gone after the story.

The cocaine story, like the prescription story, was a legitimate one. It concerned the conduct of a high public official in his special area of responsibility. It would have been a legitimate story seven months ago.

But the fact remains that neither Anderson nor The Post came totally clean with their publics. And a basic truth—that it is the media people who decide what is news and what isn't—was driven home again.●

AGRICULTURAL PROBLEMS

HON. TIM LEE CARTER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to share with my colleagues an address delivered by Robert H. Stevens, Ph. D., a professor of biology and chairman of the Bureau of Conservation and Environmental Science at Rutgers University.

Dr. Stevens' remarks, entitled "Agriculture, America's Brightest Star, Outshines Its Quibbling Critics," puts into proper perspective the invaluable contribution by those in this country who produce our food and fiber. I fear that sometimes we tend to forget how great that contribution is, and I offer this speech for the careful perusal of the Members of this body.

AGRICULTURE, AMERICA'S BRIGHTEST STAR, OUTSHINES ITS QUIBBLING CRITICS

(By Robert H. Stevens)

The towering structure of America rests primarily on the production of food and fiber. It is the basis of our standard of living and our national prosperity.

Even during the recent recession, with the highest unemployment level since the great depression of the 1930's, America is still the most fortunate land on earth for the vast majority of its citizens.

U.S. industrial equipment and supplies, public services and facilities, housing and furnishings, education and training, medicine and public health, communications and transport and, above all, food and fiber, not only surpass those of any other nation on earth in abundance, quality and availability to the people, but of any nation since history began.

The efficiency of our farms is such that our burgeoning population is more than adequately nourished by the land labor of less than 5 percent of our people. We thereby release 95 percent to advance our industry, our public works, our education, our research and to enrich our culture and to maintain our defense.

The charge by uninformed persons that U.S. agriculture is wasteful of energy is without substance. Agricultural production in 1976 (the last full year of record) consumed only 3 percent of our total national energy budget, and at the same time accounted for exports equivalent to 68 percent of all petroleum imports. As for manual labor taking over energy tasks, a human being laboring 10 hours (at approximately $26.80 total wages) does work equivalent to that provided by 3 cents worth of electricity. Pesticides, also blamed by some persons as being energy consumptive, actually requires only 2 percent of our agricultural energy budget, the equivalent of .06 of 1 percent of our national energy consumption.

The other great world power, the U.S.S.R., still binds over 50 percent of her people to the toil of the soil and yet is unable to produce the bare necessities of food and fiber for her people with reliability. They have to appeal, periodically, to America to supply the deficiency.

For the first time in the history of man's long and often frustrating struggle against want, America has, in this century, found how to banish hunger, exposure and destitution from the earth.

This is by far the greatest victory that democracy and the political philosophy of freedom of choice and enterprise has won. It constitutes the fundamental fulfillment of our civilization upon which all other national accomplishment necessarily rests.

THE SEED FOR AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT

A century ago the Federal Government recognized that America was an agrarian nation, which would have to rely entirely upon its own lands and waters, its own ingenuity and industry to provide not only the bare necessities of life but also the surplus capital, only upon which the future development and prosperity of the country would have to depend.

Thus the state land grant colleges and later the agricultural experiment station systems, both state and federal, were established to educate the young rural people in the constructive use and exploitation of the land and its resources, and to research and resolve the myriad problems involved in food and fiber production.

The total investment over the past century by the taxpayers of the United States in agricultural and industrial research related to food and fiber production, about $16 billion, is returned every year in the reduced food bill paid by the American consumer.

In 1973, the cost of food to the American consumer dropped below 16 cents of the take home dollar. It has risen slightly since to about 18 cents, where it is still the lowest all time cost for the highest nutritional level of any country in the world.

In the days of the great depression, the food bill in America was over 30% of the take home income, and it lies well above that figure for most of the countries of the world today, including Russia.

Our food supply is also the most nutritious, highest quality, most abundant and it is readily available at virtually all seasons of the year.

BITING THE HAND THAT FEEDS

Yet there are those who complain of its cost, its quality, its composition, its safety and its appearance. They conveniently ignore their own enlarged incomes and the increase in expenses of the farmer. They contend the quality is inferior to that of former years, although assays reveal that on comparable scales it is actually of substantially superior quality. They say it has been over-processed into convenience foods, but they no longer want to peel potatoes, string beans, shell peas, fillet fish or bake breads and pastries.

They insist that modern U.S. foods are laced with "poisons" to preserve their appearance and to prolong shelf life, without realizing that there are no medically annotated records of any consumer becoming sick, developing cancer or dying from the direct consumption of any foodstuff that has been treated with any registered pesticide, preservative or food additive used in accordance with approved registered label recommendations.

Yet, there are numerous instances, medically recorded every year, of consumers becoming sick and of fatalities from consumption of foods contaminated with natural toxins, most of which could have been prevented by the correct use of registered, approved pesticides and preservatives.

The production, processing, preservation and distribution of food and fiber in America have become incredibility efficient. However, it has depended entirely upon research and development into all its phases, and this progress was the direct output of the land grant college and experiment station system which adapted the solution of farm problems to each area and climatic condition throughout the United States.

TEACHING OTHERS

The same system can be applied all over the world to the relief of misery for tens of millions of mankind. Indeed in a few cases the system, in miniature form, has already been exported to Mexico, to India, to the Philippines and elsewhere.

In these areas, the system has flourished and brought on the "Green Revolution," but much more needs to be done to bring the food and fiber supply up to a subsistence level and to stem the rapid approach of vast famines.

Although much can be done to relieve the misery, hunger and want of the many tens of millions of humans in Africa, in Asia and in South America and to lift them to a subsistence level, it is manifestly impossible to raise the standard of living of all mankind to that currently enjoyed in North America, or even to that of Western Europe or Mediterranean Europe.

The population of the world has already attained a level where there are simply insufficient resources—energy, arable soils, water, metals, transport, education—to raise all the peoples of the earth to the living standards of the western world.

There is no way in which many poor underdeveloped countries can be raised much above a bare subsistence without pulling down the advanced nations to virtual destitution.

We in America simply cannot appreciate the inordinate wealth and luxury that we have come to regard, not only as essential but even as our birth right. Our average income is $2,800/annum, which compares with from $334/capita/annum in South America or to $379 in Central America.

Scandanavia comes closest to the U.S. with $1,707/capita/annum. Africa is totally destitute, by western standards, ranging from $77/capita/annum in central countries to a high of $456 in the southern countries.

THE ENORMOUS TASK AHEAD

These data reveal all too vividly the utter impossibility of spreading the wealth around and the fallibility of so doing.

What needs to be done, and it will take over a century of intensive and dedicated effort to achieve even a partial success, is to spread education around to bring the findings of the research laboratory and experiment station down to the grass roots on the farm where it can go to work; to develop, introduce and distribute new species, varieties and strains of livestock and domesticated food plants into countries and edaphic areas where they can flourish; to distribute engineering skills and equipment to provide power to produce so that one man can do what it now takes perhaps a hundred or more to do; and to introduce, provide and distribute agricultural chemicals to promote the growth efficiency of favored livestock and domestic crop plants (feedstuffs and fertilizers), and to protect the increased yields produced from the ravage of insects, weeds, disease and vermin (pesticides).

Once these developing countries can learn to feed, clothe and shelter themselves from their own natural resources and labor, they can then accumulate capital through the export of goods and services and can attain the "Take-Off" stage into a semi-industrialized society and can at least reach to well above a bare subsistence existence.●

NEAL REPORTS VOTING RECORD

HON. STEPHEN L. NEAL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, in keeping with a practice I have observed ever since coming to Congress, I am making public my entire voting record.

I sincerely believe that the citizens of the Fifth District of North Carolina have a right to know how I voted on every issue coming before the House. Further, I believe that record should be compiled in such a way as to free them of the burden of research.

The ensuing compilation is for the months of January, February and March of this year. Each entry includes, in order, the roll number, a description of the question, my individual vote, the vote of the North Carolina delegation (in parentheses), and, finally, the vote of the entire House. The N.C. delegation vote is in the following order: Yes, no, and the number not present or not voting. "DNV" in all instances means "did not vote."

VOTING RECORD—SECOND SESSION, 95TH CONGRESS

(2) Amendment to clarify authority for warrantless search and seizure under Fish and Wildlife Improvement Act, specifying that a federal officer must have reasonable grounds to believe offense has been committed. Yes (4–5–2). Passed, 215–131.

(3) Final passage, Fish and Wildlife Improvement Act, establishing a uniform policy of game law enforcement. Yes (8–1–2). Passed, 292–59.

(5) To authorize State Department to acquire a bust of Gen. George C. Marshall. Yes (10–0–1). Passed, 351–22.

(6) To require Civil Service Commission to comply with state court orders or property settlements in connection with divorces or legal separations of civil service employees. Yes (9–1–1). Passed, 369–7.

(7) To give civil service retirement credit to all federal employees of Japanese ancestry for time spent in World War II internment camps. Yes (8–1–2). Passed, 366–12.

(8) To increase federal loan guarantee for fishing vessels from 75 percent to 87.5 percent of actual costs. No (6–3–1). Passed, 309–68.

(10) To permit federal tax court judges to withdraw from tax court pension system any time before benefits begin to accrue. Yes (11–0). Passed, 399–1.

(11) To authorize $6 million over three years for the Administrative Conference of the U.S. No (6–5). Passed, 292–103.

(12) To make it a federal offense to use children under age 16 for the production of pornographic materials, or to sell or distribute these materials. Yes (11–0). Passed, 401–0.

(13) To consider (adopt rule) Outer Continental Shelf Land Act Amendments. Yes (5–5–1). Passed, 247–158.

(15) Breaux Substitute for Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act Amendments. No (6–5). Failed, 187–211.

(16) Minority substitute for Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act Amendments. No (3–8). Failed, 143–229.

(18) To authorize $1 million for the Office of Rail Public Counsel. Yes (10–0–1). Passed, 318–44.

(19) To require ConRail to assume the bankrupt railroads' obligations to pay medical and life insurance premiums for 13 employees who retired before ConRail took over assets of the railroads. No (7–3–1). Passed, 314–50.

(20) To allow supplemental or all-cargo air carriers to qualify for new air cargo certificates immediately, rather than wait one year. Yes (10–0–1). Passed, 403–0.

(21) To delete Interior Department authority for core and test drilling under Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act. Yes (10–0–1). Passed, 328–77.

(22) Continental Shelf: To eliminate lease cancellation compensation for investment of leasee if lease is canceled. Yes. (10–0–1). Passed, 208–194.

(23) Continental Shelf: To limit the use of new bidding systems to at least 10 percent of newly leased areas, but not more than 30 percent. No (8–2–1). Failed, 196–207.

(24) Continental Shelf: To require that new bidding systems be used for at least 20 percent, but not more than 50 percent, of newly leased acreage. No. (7–3–1). Passed, 219–188.

(25) To resolve into Committee of the Whole House to consider Bankruptcy Law Revision. Yes (10–0–1). Passed, 405–4.

(26) To strike provision of Bankruptcy Law Revision to establish an independent bankruptcy court and make bankruptcy judges federal lifetime judges. Yes (10–1). Failed, 146–262.

(27) Continental Shelf: To give discretionary authority to Justice Department to review proposed OCS lease sales for possible antitrust implications. Yes (11–0). Passed, 241–162.

(28) Continental Shelf: To strike provisions of the bill requiring random selection of tracts to be used under new bidding systems. Yes. (9–2). Passed, 225–174.

(29) To approve the journal of the last day's proceedings. Yes (10–0–1). Passed, 368–21.

(30) Continental Shelf: To strike provisions establishing documentation, registry and manning requirements for vessels and rigs on the OCS. No (0–10–1). Failed, 118–280.

(31) Continental Shelf: To require that all building and rebuilding of vessels, platforms and rigs for the OCS would have to be performed in the U.S. No (0–11). Failed, 201–208.

LEGISLATION TO FACILITATE THE COAST GUARD'S SEABORNE DRUG INTERDICTION

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I testified before the Subcommittee on the Coast Guard and Navigation, which is chaired by my distinguished colleague from New York (Mr. BIAGGI), in support of H.R. 10371 and H.R. 10698, respectively measures authored by the gentleman from New York and myself, that would facilitate the enforcement by the Coast Guard of laws relating to the importation of heroin, cocaine, marihuana and other controlled substances. Both proposals are designed to prohibit any individual on board a U.S. vessel on the high seas and any U.S. citizen on board a foreign vessel on the high seas to possess, with the intent to distribute or dispense, any federally controlled substance.

The subcommittee is considering revising these legislative proposals to include, among other things, prohibiting the transfer of a controlled substance from any vessel to a vessel of the United States, or to a vessel subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. This is known as the "mother ship" transfer, whereby the "mother ship" remains outside the U.S. Customs inspection waters and unloads the contraband cargo to a small, inconspicuous vessel that then mingles among the tens of thousands of recreational boats in U.S. waters and eventually unloads the illicit cargo onto the isolated coves scattered throughout this Nation's coastline.

A second major proposed revision to H.R. 10371 is to provide funds for the Coast Guard to purchase additional seaborne drug interdicting equipment.

As a member of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control who has participated in the select committee's recent drug trafficking hearings in Florida, Hawaii, and Guam. I want to assure my colleagues that our drug law enforcement agencies need additional personnel, first-rate equipment and funds to compete against the sophisticated equipment currently used by the international criminal syndicates whose Lear jets and 7-knot corsa boats are no match for our antiquated World War II aircraft, sluggish vessels and other outdated equipment. Our law enforcement agents need assistance in the form of legislation that would provide them with the authority to plug this existing law enforcement loophole and funds to purchase better equipment. The Coast Guard also needs communications equipment, radar equipment and other sophisticated radio gear.

There is also a need for the Coast Guard to emphasize drug law enforcement as one of its missions and to develop a personnel system that emphasizes law enforcement as a career. These dedicated agents who daily risk their lives in interdicting narcotics trafficking and in apprehending drug traffickers are to be commended for their outstanding drug interdicting accomplishments; but they also need our legislative help.

Mr. Speaker, in order to share with my colleagues my thoughts regarding Mr. BIAGGI's bill, H.R. 10371, and my proposal, H.R. 10698, together with my views regarding a suggested revision to these measures, I am inserting the complete text of my statement before the Subcommittee on the Coast Guard and Navigation at this point in the RECORD. I will welcome the views and support of my colleagues on these legislative proposals which are intended to assist the Coast Guard in interdicting the narcotics trafficking, which has reached catastrophic proportions, and in apprehending the drug traffickers who profit from the human misery of this sordid business.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN, BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES' SUBCOMMITTEE ON COAST GUARD AND NAVIGATION ON H.R. 10371 AND H.R. 10698, JULY 26, 1978

Mr. Chairman and distinguished members of the Subcommittee on the Coast Guard and Navigation, I welcome this opportunity to join you in the important proceedings regarding H.R. 10371 and H.R. 10698 respectively, measures that you, Mr. Chairman, and I have authored that would facilitate the enforcement by the Coast Guard of laws relating to the importation of heroin, cocaine, marihuana and other controlled substances. Minor differences between our two measures aside, both proposals are designed to prohibit any individual on board a U.S. vessel on the high seas and any U.S. citizen on board a foreign vessel on the high seas to possess, with the intent to distribute or dispense, heroin, cocaine, marihuana, or any other controlled drugs.

The U.S. Coast Guard's authority to interdict illicit drugs on the high seas is broadly governed by title 14, section 2 of the United States Code, which authorizes the Coast Guard to "enforce or assist in the enforcement of all applicable Federal laws on or under the high seas and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States." Section 89 of that same title permits the Coast Guard to "make inquiries, inspections, searches, seizures, and arrests upon the high seas and waters over which the United States has jurisdiction for the prevention, detection and suppression of violations of laws of the United States." This broad authority (and certain drug-related statutes) does not, however, prohibit a U.S. citizen from possessing Federally controlled drugs while on board a United States or a foreign vessel on the high seas; nor does it prohibit a foreign national on board a United States vessel on the high seas from possessing these Federally controlled drugs.

As a member of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control that held hearings last November at the United States Mission to the United Nations in New York on international narcotics control . . . a hearing that you, Mr. Chairman, participated in in your capacity as ex officio member of the Narcotics Select Committee . . . I was impressed by Rear Admiral Norman C. Venzke, Chief of the Office of Operations and Director of the Enforcement of Laws and Treaties Program of the U.S. Coast Guard, who testified:

"The general revision of drug laws which produced the Comprehensive Drug Abuse and Control Act of 1970 omitted the provision making the possession of quantities of drugs by United States vessels on the high seas a Federal crime. Consequently, Coast Guard drug law enforcement action against U.S. vessels at sea beyond the 12-mile customs zone now requires the proof of conspiracy to import before law enforcement action can be properly undertaken."

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 10371 and H.R. 10698 are designed to help plug that loophole by prohibiting that conduct and by subjecting the convicted violator to an imprisonment of not more than 15 years and a fine of not more than $25,000, or both. A subsequent conviction would subject the violator to imprisonment of not more than 30 years, a fine of not more than $50,000, or both—penalties that are stipulated by the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that you are considering revising your bill, H.R. 10371, that, among other things, would broaden the scope of this measure to include the following: (1) to state as a Congressional finding and declaration that the Coast Guard place increased emphasis on the interdiction of controlled substances on the high seas by vessels bound for the United States and to authorize the purchase of law enforcement equipment necessary to meet the operational requirements of seaborne drug interdiction; (2) to prohibit the attempt or the conspiracy to import or to transport any controlled substance into the United States; (3) to prohibit the transfer of a controlled substance from any vessel to a vessel of the United States; (4) to authorize the President to conclude agreements with foreign nations to seek prior consent of a foreign nation for the Coast Guard to board and seize a vessel violating this legislative proposal and to arrest the individual on board such vessel; and (5) to authorize the appropriation of not more than $30 million for each of fiscal years 1980-1982 in order to carry out the purposes of this proposal.

Mr. Chairman, I commend you for broadening H.R. 10371, for sharing your thoughts with me and for providing me and my staff the opportunity to make some suggestions to your revised proposal. In my view, two provisions of the revision are particularly critical: (1) prohibiting the transfer of a controlled substance from one vessel to a vessel of the United States, either within the territorial seas of the United States or on the high seas and (2) to authorize the appropriation of funds to permit the Coast Guard to purchase seaborne interdicting equipment.

I encourage you to go forward with the revised version of H.R. 13071, and I will be pleased to join you in this measure as a cosponsor. The revision clearly broadens the very things that your original proposal and my H.R. 10698 would attempt to accomplish, namely: to provide the Coast Guard with the law enforcement tools to conduct effective seaborne interdictions and to minimize the advantage in equipment and smuggling techniques currently used by international criminal syndicates.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, one major seaborne drug smuggling technique used by organized crime and independent narcotics traffickers is the "mother ship" technique popularized during the 1920s and the early 1930s by prohibition rum runners, whereby the "mother ship" remains outside U.S. Customs inspection waters and unloads the contraband cargo to a small, inconspicuous vessel that then mingles among the tens of thousands of recreational boats in U.S. waters. The smaller, "narcotics running" craft eventually unloads its illicit cargo onto the isolated coves scattered throughout this Nation's coastline. From there, these deadly drugs are dispersed by organized crime's intricate operational networks to virtually every city, town and school district in this country, injecting our citizens with narcotic misery and destruction.

Obviously, if the Coast Guard (and other drug laws enforcement agencies) are to effectively combat the international criminal syndicates whose Lear jets, 70-knot corsa boats, and other sophisticated equipment outmaneuver the antiquated World War II aircraft, obsolete boats and other vintage equipment used by this Nation's law enforcement agencies, then these brave and dedicated law enforcement agents, who daily risk their lives in interdicting the narcotics traffic and in apprehending the drug traffickers, must be provided sufficient personnel, first-rate equipment and sufficient funds to perform their difficult and dangerous tasks.

Last month, the Narcotics Select Committee focused its spotlight on drug trafficking in southern Florida—an area that is currently the drug trafficking capital of the Nation. The drug trafficking problem in Florida has reached epidemic proportions . . . it is a tidal wave, a drug crisis of catastrophic dimensions The problem of interdicting the massive quantities of illicit drugs from polluting our shores and from preventing these deadly drugs from moving inland to every region of our Nation is herculean.

Just last week, on July 12th and July 14th, the U.S. Coast Guard cutter Durable seized 82,000 pounds of marihuana worth an estimated $30 million and arrested 17 drug traffickers. I understand that during the 10 weeks from May 6th, 1978, through July 19th, 1978, the U.S. Coast Guard, combined with the U.S. Customs Service and local law enforcement authorities seized 804,919 pounds of marihuana (or more than 402 tons) worth an estimated street value of $289,186,497 and arrested 137 traffickers. During the month of June, Customs agents in Florida seized 35 pounds of cocaine worth approximately $105,000 and 367,655 pounds of marihuana worth approximately $183,827,500. These seizures represent only the tip of the narcotics iceberg; they do not represent seizures by other Federal, State and local law enforcement agencies, nor do they represent the amount of hallucinogens, stimulants, barbituates or other dangerous drugs that have been seized by law enforcement authorities.

Clearly, if this Nation's law enforcement authorities are to perform effectively and efficiently their dangerous assignments and to place their lives on the line, then they must be provided with personnel, the equipment and the funds to compete against the sophisticated equipment of organized crime whose highly organized international criminal syndicates reach into every region of the world and whose sordid business corrupts the political, economic, social and moral fabric of the international community. Restrictions against the "mother ship" transfer of any controlled substance and the authorization of appropriations for seaborne drug interdicting resources is a step in the right direction to help impede these illicit drug trafficking operations and these provisions will go a long way in plugging certain deficiencies currently hamstringing the Coast Guard.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I commend you and your distinguished colleagues on this subcommittee for focusing attention on H.R. 13071 and on H.R. 10698, and for thinking about ways to broaden these measures. In the event that you and members of this distinguished subcommittee decide to go forward with this proposed revision, I can assure you that you can count on me to cosponsor this legislative proposal and to support it fully.●

FAIRNESS IN EXTENDING ERA

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, a majority of the American people are committed to the principle and the spirit of the equal rights amendment. A majority of the Members of this House share that commitment. I believe full equality for women should be assured in our Constitution.

The amending process insures full public debate of any proposed amendment and contributes to the development of a national consensus. The very requirement that three-fourths of the States must ratify the amendment increases the power of an amendment, and amendments themselves are strengthened by the rigorous procedure of amending the Constitution.

The current debate over the extension of the period for ratification of the equal rights amendments has raised the question of the effect the extension will have on the amendment itself.

The issue which will soon be before us in this House will not be whether one favors the equal rights amendment or not. The debate will not even be limited to the simple question of exemption—yea or nay.

Archie Salyards, the editorial page editor of the Duluth News-Tribune, offered a significant contribution to the debate over extension in his editorial of July 20, 1978.

That editorial argues that the equal rights amendment is so important to the American people that it merits the extension. At the same time, the importance of the amendment cannot override the principle of fairness in the process of considering the amendment.

Extension without providing for reconsideration of previous action on ERA by the States is unfair to those who oppose the amendment, he says.

Salyard's editorial is thought-provoking and I commend it to my colleagues.

I am looking forward to the House debate. I know the equal rights amendment is an issue about which my colleagues feel deeply. The depth of feeling in this House will contribute to the full discussion of the extension which will add to the confidence of the people in this House and in the process by which the Constitution is amended.

FAIR IS FAIR

It's ironic how proponents of the Equal Rights Amendment support a move that is contrary to the very title of the amendment.

The Irony—or insolence, if you prefer—came during congressional maneuvering to extend the deadline for ratification of the amendment by a required 38 states. The original seven-year limitation expires next March 22, and advocates first asked to extend it another seven years.

The House Judiciary Committee Tuesday approved a compromise extension to June 30, 1982. That, in itself, would seem reasonable.

But where the committee, and the proponents, went wrong was in taking away the equal rights of opponents to the amendment. As approved in committee, the proamendment forces have until 1982 to convince state legislatures to ratify the amendment, yet the anti-faction is NOT given equal time to convince legislatures which have approved the amendment to rescind what they have done.

Thirty-five states have ratified the amendment, although three later rescinded approval. The legality of the rescission option still has not been settled by Congress.

It has become obvious the nation hasn't made up its mind yet on the merits of the amendment, at least not in a collective majority strong enough to satisfy 38 state legislatures. A few more years, or even another seven, is a small price to pay to assure the ultimate decision is acceptable to a preponderance of the American people.

Extension of the ratification deadline obviously works to the advantage of those supporting the amendment. Important, naturally, is the additional time given state legislatures to react to the wishes of a changing society—and attitudes are changing on woman's role in that society.

Equally as important, however, is the fact that while the amendment lives, it is being discussed and debated. The amendment's mere presence as a social issue perhaps is doing more to further the rights of women, and change the attitudes of men, than its quick and simple approval ever would have done.

Yes, the Equal Rights Amendment deserves a better, and longer chance. But if Congress doesn't give the amendment opponents the same rights that it gives proponents, then the amendment deserves to die. Fair is fair.

And the fair sex, if anyone, should realize that.●

NATIONS DO NOT WANT TO BE DOMINATED BY RUSSIA

HON. PAUL N. McCLOSKEY, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, following World War II, we commenced a massive program of economic assistance to our former enemies, Germany and Japan. Our purpose was not only humanitarian; we sought to create strong and friendly allies in our efforts to contain the domination of Soviet Communism over smaller nations.

Over 5 years have now elapsed since American troops were withdrawn from Vietnam, and over 3 years have passed since the North Vietnamese were successful in reuniting their country.

It seems time to resume commercial and diplomatic relations with the Vietnamese.

As in the case of Germany and Japan, and certainly as in the case of Yugoslavia, our national interests are served by strengthening a nation which has no great desire to be dependent on Soviet support.

In this connection, there have been some recent newspaper articles which bear on this point. I enclose them in the RECORD at this point:

[From the New York Times, July 24, 1978]

RENEWING TIES WITH VIETNAM

(By Peter Kovler)

WASHINGTON—Now that the United States is out of Vietnam, it is time to get back in. On Sept. 14 the United States trade embargo against that country, issued by executive order in 1975, expires, forcing President Carter either to renew or cancel it. For practical strategic and moral reasons it is an ideal opportunity for the President to break with his predecessors and allow trade. It would be the beginning of a sane and civilized United States-Vietnamese relationship.

Each country would derive important economic benefits. United States self-interest would be served, according to Michael Emmons, president of the American Chamber of Commerce in Hong Kong, because "we feel that the U.S. trade embargo on Vietnam punishes American business and not Hanoi."

And for Vietnam, the new trade would spur post-war reconstruction. Without entering into the question of the United States Government's post-war promises made in Paris three years ago, American firms could aid a poor country that has been at battle for decades. Indeed recent comments by Vietnamese leaders indicate they might like United States economic ties even without direct aid from Washington.

The two countries and several American corporations could particularly benefit from closer links in the agricultural and oil industries. Vietnam now imports approximately one million tons of grain per year. Instead of buying it from the United States, they acquire it from the Soviet Union, Canada, Sweden, the European Economic Community and others. This is especially appalling, as Senator Hubert H. Humphrey pointed out one month before his death, "given our unprecedented trade deficit and our depressed prices caused by overflowing stocks."

Vietnam's oil potential may be as promising as that of any area outside the Middle East. However, according to Maurice Strong, chairman of Petro-Canada and former Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Human Environment, it is the "lack of normal relations with the United States that has constrained the pace of Vietnam's reconstruction, particularly oil exploration and development."

Strategically, it is crucial that the United States consider new East Asian conflicts and consequently become friendlier toward Vietnam. Today the primary clashes are not "yellow versus white" nor "red versus red-white-and Vietnam against Cambodia. A potential threat is that a passive American diplomacy will de facto align us with China against Vietnam; and this will force Vietnam to develop a greater dependency on the Soviet Union. By lifting the embargo, President Carter could decrease Vietnam's reliance on the Soviet Union, and eventually promote the chances for stability and peace in the area.

Morally the United States still has its post-war obligations. Not even the most gifted writer—at this late date—would dare to expound on the atrocities the United States perpetrated against Vietnam: no one wants to be reminded of the horrors. Let it suffice to say that this country acted wrongly. But now, by beginning trade and thereby permitting the Vietnamese to use some of our advanced technology, the United States can, in a small way, atone.

Proponents of a continued embargo are mostly concerned about accounting for the missing in action. The families of these men have unquestionably experienced a terrible sadness and fear; but one must seriously question whether continued strained relations will help to ferret out information about the fates of these men. Recent developments, particularly the current official Vietnamese trip to the Honolulu M.I.A. Center, seem to indicate that closer relations are more likely to bring out the truth, rather than to hide it.

Two years ago there was a consensus that the embargo should be ended. Both the House and the Senate accepted it but it was President Ford's veto that stopped the move. Now, the United States has the chance to push for a totally new sort of "Vietnamization," not based on lies and self-deception, but on an ethical and intelligent approach to Southeast Asia. At least one Congressional advocate of lifting the embargo, Representative Jonathan B. Bingham, a Democrat from New York, has indicated that there could be hearings. One can only hope that renewed Congressional pressure, along with some fresh thinking that recognizes we are no longer fighting the Vietnam war, will compel President Carter to end this pointless restriction.

TRADE BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE SOCIALIST REPUBLIC OF VIETNAM

Most Asian nations in which American companies have substantial operations, including all members of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, are moving rapidly to establish normal diplomatic and trade ties with the Socialist Republic of Vietnam.

Because of the embargo on U.S. trade with Vietnam, U.S. companies are increasingly finding themselves in anomalous and sometimes embarrassing situations. Two examples can demonstrate this:

(1) A U.S.-controlled company sells spare parts to an indigenous company in an ASEAN country, which then resells them to Vietnam. When the U.S. company discovers the final destination of the parts, it is compelled to refuse further orders, thus souring a long-time relationship and promoting the Asian company to turn to other suppliers, particularly from Japan or Western Europe.

(2) A U.S. bank discovers that its European subsidiary is discussing participation in a syndication to finance exports to Vietnam. The U.S. bank is forced to instruct its subsidiary to withdraw totally.

Vietnam faces severe economic difficulties, primarily resulting from extreme weather conditions and delays in restructuring society after the long war, but it is considered these difficulties will be overcome, creating the probability of Vietnam becoming one of the strongest economic forces in the region during the next decade.

Japan has established itself as Vietnam's leading non-communist trade partner, with two-way trade in 1977 estimated at US$230 million.

Major commodities include steel, coal and marine products. Japan purchased some US$60 million worth of Vietnamese coal last year and an agreement has been signed for the Vietnamese purchase of 200,000 tons of Japanese steel annually during 1978–1980.

In addition, Norwegian, Italian and German oil companies have been granted exploration and exploitation rights off the coast of southern Vietnam. These areas are near concessions formerly explored by US companies and in which there were indications of oil in commercially viable quantities. Vietnamese officials would like US participation.

Vietnam has successfully tapped the international financial market, raising a minimum of US$350 million in commercial loans. This does not include government-government aid or soft loans.

There is a potential market in Vietnam for a range of US exports, including: petroleum equipment and technology; agricultural, forestry and irrigation equipment; mining machinery; fertilizer and fertilizer plants; wheat; cotton; and aircraft spare parts.

The American Chamber of Commerce in Hong Kong recommends that all trade restrictions imposed by the United States on trading with Vietnam be suspended.●

ALTERNATIVES TO ABORTION

HON. MAX BAUCUS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. Speaker, the question of abortion continues to be a hotly debated issue and will be for all times. Philosophers, physicians, lawmakers, and the clergy have for centuries, and will forever argue their positions—all feeling very strongly, and few changing their mind no matter how persuasive the arguments.

Despite all this intense debate, I suspect that all of us can agree on a single basic premise: namely, no one is for abortion. No, abortion is simply a bad alternative to the more basic and infinitely more resolvable problem of pregnancies that, for any variety of reasons, are unwanted.

Abortion is no more a solution to unwanted pregnancies than war is a solution to preventing human rights violations in our world. In both cases, the easy "solution" is just as repugnant as the problem itself.

The real solution, and the challenge that must be faced by Congress—and by both sides in the abortion debate—is how we can best help to keep people from feeling backed into a corner and perceiving abortion as their only way out.

There are, in fact, many alternatives to abortion. And our responsibility in Congress is to take immediate, appropriate, and effective legislative action which will provide access to real abortion alternatives. Unfortunately, the efforts made by Congress in this area, to date, have been inexcusably inadequate.

In fiscal year 1975 the Department of Health, Education and Welfare spent about $100 million under title X of the Public Health Service Act on family planning services. During the same time period, HEW spent $50 million, half the amount spent for family planning, to provide payment for medicaid abortions. 1976 data provided by the Allen Guttmacher Institute shows that there is one abortion for every 2.8 live births.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, our efforts have not come close to meeting the need.

There are at present several good legislative proposals pending before this Congress which would seek to reduce the incidence of abortion. Unfortunately, pending legislation doesn't do much good. Such legislation must be immediately enacted and put to work if we are seriously committed to resolving the abortion problem.

On April 26, 1978, I introduced H.R. 12400, the Alternatives to Abortion Act. My bill seeks to reduce the incidence of abortion by addressing the following four areas which significantly contribute to the high frequency of abortion in this country.

PREGNANCY DISABILITY

Some women have to work, and unfortunately, under present conditions, economics often force women to seek abortions.

47 percent of the current working force in this country is composed of women. Approximately 70 percent of these working women have to work. Most often they are either the family's sole wage earner or their husbands earn less than $7,000 per year. When one of these women becomes pregnant, her choice becomes clear: lose several weeks or months of income and maybe her job, or have an abortion. This choice should not have to be made.

Title I of my bill prohibits sex discrimination on the basis of pregnancy. It simply states that "women affected by pregnancy, childbirth, or related medical conditions shall be treated the same for all employment-related purposes, including receipt of benefits under fringe benefit programs, as other persons not so affected but similar in their ability or inability to work." In other words, if a company has a health insurance plan and a sick-leave policy that would permit male employees to take time off for a voluntary operation, then the same alternative should be available to female employees who are pregnant and wish time off to deliver their baby.

TEENAGE PREGNANCY

Here, perhaps, lies our greatest challenge. Not only is the incidence of teenage pregnancy and abortion higher than for other age groups, but so are the risks.

One-third of all abortions in this country are performed on teenagers. Both young girls who have abortions and those who continue their pregnancies face increased health risks. The mortality rate for pregnant teenagers is significantly higher than for older mothers, as is the mortality rate for their babies.

Title II of my bill provides grants for programs which provide prenatal and postnatal health care for both the mother and the infant.

ADOPTIONS

More pregnant women would carry their babies to term if they had assurance that their babies would have secure, happy futures. Title III of my bill enhances the idea of adoption for both the mother and prospective parents.

My bill seeks to remove any financial barriers to prospective parents by calling for an allowance of an income tax deduction for all adoption expenses and providing funds to help alleviate financial obstacles which act as barriers to qualified persons seeking to adopt. In addition, my bill promotes the establishment of uniform adoption regulations and establishes a national office of adoption information and services within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare's Office of Child Development. H.R. 12400 also seeks to eliminate black-market baby selling.

FAMILY PLANNING

The Federal Government has in fact made some progress in the field of family planning. However, in view of the number of unwanted pregnancies, it is clear that more must be done. Title IV of H.R. 12400 authorizes the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to make grants for voluntary family planning projects, research and human production, and for community-based informational and educational services about family planning.

Though H.R. 12400, the Alternatives to Abortion Act, only touches the tip of the iceberg in terms of what can and must be done to reduce the incidence of abortion in the country, it will help. And because it will help, this and similar pieces of legislation must be enacted.

I urge my colleagues to remember that we ultimately share the same concern and the same responsibility, and I ask that we all turn seriously to resolving the problem by providing realistic alternatives to abortion. Only then will women not seek abortions.●

PRODUCTIVITY: ONE U.S. COMPANY'S CONTRIBUTION

HON. TOM CORCORAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, earlier this month, I was invited to speak in Aurora, Ill., before local 1942 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. This IBEW local consists of employees of Western Electric, a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Bell System. The statement made at the meeting described the record of success enjoyed by the Bell System. I also discussed the importance of labor-management cooperation and productivity in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the crucial importance of productivity to our overall economic position in the world today, I would like to share with my colleagues the bulk of the text of my Aurora statement made before IBEW local 1942:

In preparing for this meeting, I did some research on your industry and found that the Bell System and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers have a record of which you can all be proud. In fact, your very existence as a private enterprise reflects favorably on you because the telecommunications industry of most countries is controlled by the Government. Although the telecommunications industry is part of the private sector in the United States, it is closely regulated by the Government. Prices which are charged, services offered, and profits earned are all regulated by the Government. I am certainly not an advocate of Government regulation and am happy to note the success of your organization despite some such regulation.

Your success is borne out by several impressive statistics:

First. In 1977 the Bell System handled 10 percent more long distance calls than in 1976 and it added more telephones than in any previous year.

Second. The Bell System used 11 percent less energy in 1977 than in 1973, although its volume of business has grown 33 percent. Considering the extent of the energy problem in this country, this is a remarkable achievement.

Third. Ninety-five percent of American households now have telephone service.

Another item worth noting is the awarding of a nearly half-billion dollar contract to Western Electric to furnish and maintain 300 microwave radio relay stations in Saudi Arabia. In view of our country's poor balance of trade record, such an accomplishment on the part of Western Electric is good news indeed. The Department of Commerce just released figures which show that U.S. imports of oil have now been exceeded by our imports of machinery and transport equipment and manufactured goods. The trend of our increasingly relying on imports is a trend which has complications for all of us, particularly in terms of jobs in America.

Our increasing reliance on imported goods is due in part to bad trade and tax policies in the United States over a long period of time. This must be changed, and soon.

Moreover, the Bell System's productivity record has been a good one—during the period of 1970–76, Bell's productivity rate increased nearly 5 percent each year. One relevant statistic is that in 1967 there were 130 telephones per employee and now there are 167 per employee.

My interest in meaningful labor and management producivity is longstanding. In fact, just a year ago, I sponsored a Labor-Management Seminar on Productivity here in Aurora. We had over 60 leaders of labor and management from throughout the 15th congressional district in attendance. We heard speakers discuss ways in which productivity as well as the quality of working life can be improved—and improved to the benefit of both labor and management. For instance, we heard from representatives of labor and management from a plant in Wisconsin discuss how they contributed to implementation of a profit-sharing plan which has resulted in increased productivity as well as bonuses for the employees. We also heard from a representative of an independent Federal agency—the National Center for Productivity and Quality of Working Life—which is the Federal agency primarily concerned with productivity in the United States today. We also heard from a professor from the Illinois Institute of Labor and Industrial Relations in Champaign. The point of that seminar was to get labor and management together to discuss mutual problems and possible solutions in a way which would supplement collective bargaining agreements. Productivity means "working smarter, not working harder" and it is something in which we all have a stake.●

FROM OLYMPIC DORMITORY TO PRISON: BAD IDEA?

HON. ROBERT F. DRINAN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. DRINAN. Mr. Speaker, in 1977 when we were considering a $22 million supplemental appropriation for the Bureau of Prisons to build a youth facility at Lake Placid, N.Y. I strongly objected. The Bureau of Prisons was granted these funds to construct a facility which could be used in the 1980 Olympic games at Lake Placid for athletes' housing and which following the games would be converted to a prison for 500 youth offenders.

I fully appreciated the need for afteruse of the facility for athletes housing since the Olympic games represent a substantial investment of taxpayers money. Yet it was and remains of great concern to me that this decision was made without the benefit of full and open discussion. The Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties, and the Administration of Justice, on which I serve has held extensive hearings over the years on both corrections policy and construction.

One major issue which emerges from a discussion of prison construction is the location of facilities. The Director of the Bureau of Prisons told the subcommittee in 1975 that:

Our philosophy is that new institutions should be as close as we can humanly get them to where the offenders are from and where we can find staff and other resources.

The subcommittee was aware of the Bureau's search for a site to house young offenders from the northeast region. Since these offenders would be primarily from metropolitan areas of the northeast it was expected that efforts to find a site would focus on metropolitan areas. It was thus most disturbing to me to learn of the plan for Lake Placid. The inmates for this facility will come from New York City which is 300 miles away as well as Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia and Washington, D.C. which represent an even greater distance.

It is well recognized and substantiated that in working with youth offenders we should maximize familial and community ties which may constitute the single most important link to a law-abiding life. Along with that consideration, I have concerns about the recruitment of staff for this remote location and access to resources for contractual work and study release programs. None of these concerns were addressed when this decision was made.

I commend to my colleagues the following article of William Raspberry on this matter:

FROM OLYMPIC DORMITORY TO PRISON: BAD IDEA?

They're building dormitory facilities at Lake Placid, N.Y., to house some 1,800 young athletes for the 1980 winter Olympics. That utilization will last for a couple of weeks.

Then the "Olympic Village" will become the newest federal prison.

The idea either makes sense, or it instantly appalls. Argument—of which there is plenty—seems to change no one's mind.

The Olympic people are, of course, pleased. They get a free ride out of the deal, since the U.S. Bureau of Prisons is paying the entire $22-million cost of the facility, including its post-Olympic conversion from the dormitory to jail.

The people of Lake Placid, according to Rep. Robert C. McEwen (R), who represents that Adirondack district, also are pleased. With the highest unemployment rate in the state of New York, they naturally welcome the prospect of 225 prison jobs at an average pay of $15,000.

And the Bureau of Prisons, while acknowledging that the site runs counter to the bureau's own guidelines consider the dormitory-turned-prison a pretty good deal.

On the other side are a host of church-related groups, civil-rights organizations, a number of ad hoc bodies and, of course, the National Moratorium on Prison Construction.

Perhaps their most telling argument consists of quotes from the 1967 report of the president's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice. For instance: "New institutions should . . . be relatively small, and located as close as possible to the areas from which [they draw their] inmates, probably in or near a city rather than in a remote location."

Or from the United Nations' standards for the treatment of prisoners: "The treatment of prisoners should emphasize not their exclusion from the community but their continuing part in it. * * * Special attention shall be paid to the maintenance and improvement of such relations between a prisoner and his family as are desirable in the best interests of both."

The Lake Placid facility may meet the "relatively small" criterion, with an anticipated 500 inmates, but at a distance of nearly 300 miles from the nearest metropolitan area it will hardly be "as close as possible" to the homes of most of its inmates—most probably New York City.

The fact that almost the entire prison staff will consist of Lake Placid residents hardly emphasizes the inmates' continuing part in their community. Nor will family relations be improved by the fact that the area is served by a single bus a day or that it has hardly any low-cost housing for visitors.

"I agree that this is not the ideal location," say Michael Aun, a spokesman for the Bureau of Prisons. "Our own guidelines say we should build close to where the inmates live, which means the big cities. But every time we try to locate in a big city, we get thrown out—for instance, San Diego, in 1975. Nobody wants us around."

Location aside, said Aun, the Lake Placid facility will come close to being an ideal prison. "It will be modern and unobtrusive, with private rooms rather than concrete and iron cages. It's true that it will be more than 250 miles from New York City but, then, because of the shortage of facilities, we have federal prisoners from the Northeast located as far away as Sandstone, Minn.

"Lake Placid may be inconvenient for families in New York or Boston, but it sure as hell beats Sandstone."

According to Aun, many of the people who are opposing this particular location are in fact opposed to any new prison construction whatever. "Well, the fact is that we have to replace some of the existing facilities. McNeil Island (Washington) is falling apart. We'd like to close Leavenworth. Atlanta needs to be closed or else completely redone. Danbury (Conn.), the only facility in the Northeast, has 767 inmates in space designed for 500."

Aun's explanation won't cut much ice with those who are convinced that the whole proposal is stupid at best, a political boondoggle at worst. From their point of view, the Lake Placid location has less to do with the needs of the Bureau of Prisons than the fact that Lake Placid needs the jobs and income that the prison will provide.

Aun won't deny political influence, principally that of McEwen. But he points out that the rules require that there be a post-Olympic use for any facilities built for the Olympics. "Some of the church groups are trying to promote the idea of a permanent Olympic training center for Lake Placid," he said, "but so far, there have been no takers."

All that may be true. But for anyone who believes, as the bureau itself ostensibly believes, that prisons shouldn't be isolated, who believes that having a guard force consisting of small-town whites for a population of big-city black inmates was one of the sparks for Attica, it is hard to consider the Lake Placid prison as other than a rotten idea.●

TITO: DEVISING A FORMULA FOR WORLD PEACE

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, Yugoslavia under Marshal Tito symbolizes the importance of the nonalined nations to world peace.

The responsible leadership of Marshal Tito has ended the fratricidal civil wars of ethnically diverse Yugoslavia and has brought a degree of stability previously unknown to this region.

In an address to delegates of the nonalined nations meeting in Belgrade, Tito warned against the dangers of bloc confrontations and involvement of nonalined nations in these conflicts. Nonalinement is the only possible alternative to confrontations, international tension and ultimately new military conflagrations.

In words which the entire world should heed, Tito stated in unequivocal terms, "Sectarianism of any kind is alien to nonalinement. Divisions based on ideological, religious, and other criteria and motivations are unacceptable, no matter what slogans they hide behind."

These words of reason emanate from a leader who knows too well the horror of ethnic wars in his own country and of major armed conflict.

He was a leader in the fight against Nazi oppression in the greatest military confrontation the world has ever known.

I would like to share with my colleagues in this House a report of Marshal Tito's address which appeared in the New York Times, July 26, 1978.

His speech represents a forceful denunciation of the Soviet-Cuban intervention in Africa. That kind of intervention represents a major threat to the philosophy of nonalinement. At the same time, the Soviet-Cuban offensive threatens to involve the superpowers—the United States and Russia—and their allies in direct conflict.

We have come closer to that confrontation within the past year in Africa than we have at any time since the Cuban missile crisis in 1962.

Marshal Tito's statement comes at a most appropriate time for world peace.

The article follows:

TITO IN WARNING ON ROLE OF CUBA IN AFRICAN STRIFE

(By Flora Lewis)

BELGRADE, YUGOSLAVIA, July 25.—President Tito warned countries professing nonalignment today against letting their disputes, especially in Africa, develop into East-West power struggles through involvement of outside forces.

While he named no countries, Marshal Tito's speech, at the opening session of the conference of nonalignment nations, was clearly aimed at Soviet-backed Cuban intervention in Africa.

"There is every indication that we have again arrived at a dangerous cross-roads," he said.

President Tito called on all members of the nonaligned movement, which he helped to establish at the start of the 1960's, to "devise effective means" for settling their disputes "peacefully and democratically." Otherwise, he continued, "new forms of colonial presence, of bloc dependence, foreign influence and domination" may be imposed.

ZAIRE AND ANGOLA REPORT ACCORD

Just after he spoke, Zaire's Foreign Minister, Umba-Di-Lutete, disclosed that his country had reached an agreement with neighboring Angola, which served as the base for an invasion of Zaire's Shaba Province last spring by Katangan rebels. The invasion gave threat briefly of turning into a conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union.

The agreement was reached at a meeting of President Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire and President Agostinho Neto of Angola, with the help of President Sékou Touré of Guinea. It was drafted last week at the meeting of the Organization of African Unity in Khartoum, the Sudan.

The accord commits each side to prevent the use of its territory for armed attack on the other and for the disarming of rebel groups—such as the Cuban-trained Katangese who invaded Shaba Province.

A commission made up of representatives of Cameroon, Nigeria, the Sudan and Rwanda was estabilshed to make sure the accord is carried out, he said.

The Zairian Foreign Minister said the two sides had not discussed the presence of Cuban troops in Angola because "we don't care where they are so long as they don't interfere in our affairs; it would be against the principle of nonalignment for us to say who can be in Angola."

By the same token, he indicated, Zaire made no promises about how long a joint African force, hastily assembled to pacify Shaba, would remain. But the idea of a "pan-African intervention force" has now been abandoned, he said, and it is up to the new commission to make sure that the Zaire-Angola settlement, now "on paper," is put fully into effect.

The reconciliation has already reached a point where the Zairian officials congratulated Foreign Minister Paulo Teixeira Jorge of Angola on his speech today. The address echoed several of President Tito's points, calling for reassertion of nonalignment principles "as an active factor in international détente" and a safeguard for "territorial integrity."

AN EXAMPLE OF TITO'S STRATEGY

The Zaire-Angola agreement was one obvious example of Marshal Tito's strategy favoring negotiated settlements of the many third-world conflicts before they can lead to renewal of the cold war.

Delegations were present from the rebel movements of three countries of southern Africa where white regimes are being challenged by black forces, conflicts that could lead to broad Soviet-supported intervention and Western reaction.

While President Tito said at one point that "it is high time" the "anachronistic situation" of colonialism and racism in Africa be ended, he also seemed to be referring to the explosive situation in southern Africa. He said that "realistic possibilities" for peaceful solutions "represent not interference but offers of good offices."

Marshal Tito's carefully worded but direct statement went considerably beyond what the African countries were able to endorse last week at their Khartoum meeting, after disagreements on the Cuban and Soviet-bloc role prevented denunciation of foreign military intervention in Africa.

COLONIALISM AND HEGEMONY

While he attacked "new forms of colonialism," Marshal Tito also criticized "hegemony," the term the Yugoslavs and Chinese use for Soviet attempts at domination, and insisted that détente was "a universal process that must extend to all areas of the world."

Nonalignment is "the only possible alternative to bloc confrontations, tensions and the dangers of a new military conflagration," President Tito said.

The definition of nonalignment, particularly in the wake of Cuba's intervention in Africa and Vietnam's joining the Communist bloc's economic organization, Comecon, had been expected to be a major controversy of this meeting.

Some countries, led by Cuba, had been asserting that nonalignment must mean adherence to the "progressive" group of countries, in effect those that are Marxist oriented.

TITO SEEKS TO PRE-EMPT THE CUBANS

In several different ways, President Tito sought to pre-empt the Cuban insistence. He said nonalignment was "pledged" to resist imposition of social and political systems or ideologies. "The nonaligned countries must allow no one to jeopardize the solidarity of their movement and blunt the edge of its basic orientation and unity of action," he said. "They must allow no one to dilute the policy of nonalignment."

"Sectarianism of any kind is alien to nonalignment," he continued. "Divisions based on ideological, religious and other criteria and motivations are unacceptable, no matter what slogans they hide behind."

The Yugoslav effort to resist direct or indirect Soviet pressures on the third world was obviously well-prepared.

NORTH KOREAN MORE SPECIFIC

The North Korean Foreign Minister, Ho Dam, read a message from President Kim Il Sung that, surprisingly, was even a little more specific than Marshal Tito in rejecting the Soviet-Cuban stand.

It said that "the nonaligned countries should not classify the member countries into opposed groups arguing which nation is progressive and which is not, and not tolerate any foreign forces to interfere and dominate the nonaligned countries."

If a compromise on the basic issue of Cuba's role has already been reached, which seemed possible, it was reflected in President Tito's explicit reference to Havana as the site of next year's scheduled nonaligned summit meeting. Prospects of a confrontation here would have made that unlikely.

If the 86 year-old Yugoslav leader's efforts to restore a unified overall position among the nonaligned countries are effective, they could bring a subtle but crucial shift in the trend of world politics and a new obstacle to Soviet expansion without direct United States involvement.

NO DRAMA AND LITTLE COLOR

Today's opening session provided no drama and little color. There were no attacks on the United States. Most of the delegates wore Western clothes, and many of them, as delegates to the United Nations, had long since grown accustomed to meeting each other in elaborate conference halls—where speeches are made in public and log-rolling deals are worked out in private.

Marshal Tito, limping on a cane and reading his speech while seated, looked fit otherwise and he spoke in a firm voice. He wore his customary ice-cream linen summer suit

As he noted, except for the issues of southern Africa and the Middle East, the struggles that brought the original group of 25 nations together 17 years ago had mostly been overcome.

But now, the enlarged group of 87 member countries, 20 observers, including four liberation movements, seven guests and one country with "special status," Belize, is split by a series of rivalries, with several of the countries battling each other.●

FREEDOM FOR THE INDIVIDUAL

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, appreciation for one's country generally increases with time and experience. Yet at 15 years old, Sara Shulsinger reminds us of a fundamental, and too often forgotten, reason for our Nation's success: America's people are free. They are free in part because America as a country is free from foreign constraints and outside domination.

A first prize winner for the second year in a row of the Palos Verdes Peninsula Independence Day essay contest, 1978, Sara observes in her essay that for an individual to be free, he or she must live in a free land—an appropriate reminder on an Independence Day.

The essay follows:

THE INDIVIDUAL NATION

The United States of America has a long history of successful foreign relations. This was most likely inspired by three documents: the Declaration of Independence, George Washington's Farewell Address, and the Monroe Doctrine. These all discouraged American intervention in international political trials and tribulations. Thus the United States has managed to remain independent of foreign domination, and this status as an individual nation gives its people more choices.

The first step away from outside complications was the Declaration of Independence. America's forefathers foresaw from experience the dangers of involvement with other nations, and so they stated twenty-seven specific reasons why the United States must avoid foreign control. The folly of having another nation ruling the United States becomes clear through these words.

And then in September, 1796, George Washington, with the help of his friend, Alexander Hamilton, compiled his views concerning future foreign policy into his valedictory message. He believed that it would be a wise America that would avoid either patronizing or disfavoring any other country. Unfortunately, Washington's advice has not been followed to perfection, but this nation is still one of the most independent ever.

A third early American document, the Monroe Doctrine, addressed the problem in a different manner. James Monroe neatly slipped into his seventh annual message a few sentences which said that the United States had kept out of European affairs, but if any European power antagonized an existing country of the Western Hemisphere or tried to colonize this area any further, the United States would take action. He reinforced this statement in his eighth message, proving that no matter how European officials screamed, this statement would have all of America to back it up.

And America has backed it up. And yet it has managed to remain on excellent terms with most nations throughout the world. The United States has mutual tariff agreements with many major countries, including the entire United Kingdom and Japan, thus exposing its people to a wider world. Therefore individuality is encouraged and American residents have greater tolerance and eagerness for what is new and different. Since the United States is an individual, individual rights are protected.●

COMMEMORATION OF CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, in view of the recent commemoration of Captive Nations Week, I wish to insert several formal proclamations issued during the past week which display the nationwide interest on behalf of those people held under Red dictatorship. I respectfully direct the attention of the the Members to the proclamations issued by Mayor E. Lee Comer, Jr., of the city of Independence, Mo., and by Gov. John D. Rockefeller IV of the State of West Virginia:

PROCLAMATION

Whereas, the imperialistic politics of Russian Communists have led, through direct and indirect aggression, to the subjection and enslavement of the peoples of Poland, Hungary, Lithuania, Ukraine, Czecho-Slovakia, Latvia, Estonia, Byelorussia, Romania, Georgia, North Korea, Cossackia, Turkestan, North Vietnam, Cuba, Cambodia, South Vietnam, Laos, and others; and

Whereas, the desire for liberty and independence by the overwhelming majority of peoples in these conquered nations constitutes a powerful deterrent to any ambitions of Communist leaders to initiate a major war; and

Whereas, the freedom loving peoples of the captive nations look to the United States as the citadel of human freedom and human rights and to the people of the United States as the leaders in bringing about their freedom and independence; and

Whereas, the Congress of the United States by unanimous vote passed Public Law 86-90 establishing the third week in July each year as Captive Nations Week and inviting the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate prayer, ceremonies and activities; expressing their sympathy with and support for the just aspirations of the captive nations.

Now, therefore, I, E. Lee Comer, Jr., Mayor of the City of Independence, do hereby proclaim the week of July 16-22, 1978, as Captive Nations Week in Independence, Missouri, and call upon our citizens to join with others in observing this week by offering prayers and dedicating their efforts for the peaceful liberation of oppressed and subjugated peoples all over the world.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the City to be affixed this 16th day of July, 1978.

A PROCLAMATION

Whereas, the imperialistic politics of Russian Communists have led, through direct and indirect aggression, to the subjugation and enslavement of the peoples of many countries; and

Whereas, the desire for liberty and independence by the overwhelming majority of peoples in these conquered nations constitutes a powerful deterrent to any ambitions of Communist leaders to initiate a major war; and

Whereas, the freedom loving peoples of the captive nations look to the United States as the citadel of human freedom and human rights and to the people of the United States as the leaders in bringing about their freedom and independence; and

Whereas, the Congress of the United States by unanimous vote passed Public Law 86-90 establishing the third week in July each year as Captive Nations Week and inviting the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate prayer, ceremonies and activities; expressing their sympathy with and support for the just aspirations of the captive nations.

Now, therefore, I, John D. Rockefeller IV, Governor of the State of West Virginia, do hereby proclaim the week of July 16 through July 22, 1978, as Captive Nations Week in West Virginia, and call upon our citizens to join with others in observing this week by offering prayers and dedicating their efforts for the peaceful liberation of oppressed and subjugated peoples all over the world.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the Great Seal of the State to be affixed.●

FDA'S PROPOSED RESTRICTIONS ON ANTIBIOTICS

HON. CHARLES ROSE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, the antibiotics issue arose from an incident in Great Britain 10 years ago where a tolerance problem occurred that resulted in the issuance of the Swann report. This report led to government-restricted use of antibiotics in animal feeds. Since then a recent Braude study from the University of Pennsylvania has examined its effect and concluded there was no converse improvement in human health from the British restrictions as one would expect. An article outlining subsequent British problems is attached for your information.

The Canadian Health Protection Branch, Canada's FDA equivalent, when faced with similar requests for restrictions, has admitted to inconclusive results of research that cannot be objectively measured. I regard these remarks as significant of understanding the ramifications of the proposed restrictions if they remain unsubstantiated by scientific consensus. Part III will present a report by the Watt Publishing Co., "Antibiotic in Animal Feeds: Risk vs. Benefit," outlining the history of the proposed restrictions.

MANY PROBLEMS IN BRITISH ANTIBIOTIC POLICY

(By Rex Wilmore)

The rosy picture painted by British authorities and even British pigmen with regard to experience with very restricted use of drugs in hog feeds changes a great deal if you really dig into the subject in conversations with pig farmers.

The British experience during the past 4½ years without antibacterial drugs in hog feed is used as an example by those advocating similar regulations in the U.S. Indications are that things are going smoothly in the British pig industry. At least that's what American visitors report and what British authorities say. Even British pigmen claim they've had no problems doing without drugs. Yet when you get out on pig farms, talk with the owners and managers, and really dig into their programs, you find a completely different story. They do have problems with their prescription approach to drug use. And there are indications that U.S. problems would be much worse under the same restrictions.

Even though they voice overwhelming acceptance of drug restrictions and regulations, British producers often use the few drugs available in massive amounts and in combinations U.S. producers would not even consider. They're trying to squeeze every bit of efficiency possible out of their feed, and they're trying to head off, or treat, disease outbreaks.

Use of broad-spectrum drugs in livestock feeds has been under fire in the U.S. for four years—some drugs and combinations have already been taken off the market, and others are under a threat of removal. The British regulations, and results, are held up as strong evidence that you wouldn't suffer if your drugs for growth promotion and disease prevention were put under prescription to "safeguard" man and animals.

Manufacturers are working frantically to provide proof that feeding antibiotics and similar antibacterials doesn't pose a health hazard to humans or animals to head off the threat. The basic concern is that continuous feeding of drugs will result in emergence of bacteria resistant to those drugs—which no one denies. But the possibility of illness in man or animals—illness which couldn't be effectively treated because of the resistance—is the point of contention. FDA and some medical authorities feel it is possible, so FDA has required that companies invest millions in research to prove that it doesn't happen. Other points are involved, but the key question is whether there's a danger to man.

Experience and research to date indicate there isn't, but the research is continuing anyway. No rulings or decisions by FDA are expected in the near future, but that doesn't mean the threat is lessened.

The United Kingdom restricted most effective drugs used for disease prevention and growth promotion 4½ years ago. They're now fed only for treatment, on prescription from a veterinarian. The British pig industry did not suffer a disaster when the switch was made, and seems on first look to have few problems because of drug regulations. But they do have problems. More important, their pig industry is considerably different from our own—and some of those differences make it possible for them to do without broad-spectrum drugs where U.S. producers could not. FDA observers, not familiar with our hog industry, who visited the U.K. seem to have overlooked these differences. When they're taken into account, the idea of restricting drugs here produces a multitude of problems.

There are three differences:

1. The tendency in Britain is to specialization, either producing weaners, or fattening weaners. Farrow-to-finish units are much less common than in the U.S. On top of that, producers concentrate on producing one type of market pig. This specialization produces a high degree of managerial skill, but in a limited scope—a case of doing an excellent job within one segment of the pork industry. The American producer, by contrast, is apt to be working in all phases of production, spreading his management knowledge and abilities thinner than his British counterpart.

2. Size of unit is a second big difference. U.K. units tend to be smaller than those in the U.S. Yet labor is more available, and labor costs lower, so the U.K. pigman has more manpower available. He lavishes more care, observation and management time on his pigs than the typical American hogmen can. At the same time, the British pigman or manager has fewer other enterprises to worry about—those working with pigs generally specialize only in that phase of agriculture, so the manager focuses more management on his pig enterprise.

That means he can, and does shoot for maximum production per unit—sow, pen, whatever—and maximum quality. The American, because he's working in more areas and stretching his management thinner, tends to settle for less than top output. Instead, he boosts the number of units to increase production. The end result is the same—more pigs and more profits. But the manner of getting there is quite different.

3. The U.K. pigman has an effective, low-cost alternate for growth promotion in copper sulfate. U.S. producers have nothing available to replace growth-promoting antibiotics, while the U.K. pigman did. Copper consistently gives between 10 percent and 15 percent improvement in feed efficiency under British conditions. It performs much the same growth promotion function for the British producer that low-level antibiotics fill in the U.S. It has been available since 1958.

Because of the cost differences, British pigmen had already begun switching away from antibiotics for growth promotion before use of drugs was restricted. When they lost most drugs, copper took up much of the slack, making the transition to prescription use of drugs a relatively painless one. "Without copper sulfate, we would have had a much different situation, with more problems," says Dr. Dick Melrose, chief veterinary surgeon of Britain's Meat and Livestock Commission.

Copper sulfate is approved for use in the U.S. at low levels as a trace mineral but is not approved at high levels for growth stimulation or disease prevention, and it is not considered likely that it will become available as a feed additive at high levels.

Companies are not likely to spend the funds which would be necessary to develop the environmental impact data required by the Environmental Protection Agency, especially in view of the EPA's attitude with regard to potential buildup of copper in the soil as a result of spreading manure from copper-fed pigs. Another deterrent is the fact that there would be little opportunity for a company to recover the large expenditures required to clear use of copper sulfate in hog feeds, since no license for exclusive sale of the material could be obtained, and anyone could reap the benefits of the developmental expenditures. Use of copper sulfate in hog feeds was cleared in Britain before the environmental era and the British have taken a much more lenient view of buildup of copper in the soil than has the U.S. EPA.

Better management was supposed to take up some of the slack left when drug use was restricted in Britain. And there's no doubt that successful pig farmers in Britain have intensified their management. "Antibiotics in the past were used to overcome bad management," says Dr. Nick Galbraith, Newsbury veterinarian. "General management of pig units now is far superior to that of five years ago, before the restrictions."

Yet better management hasn't solved many of the health problems. "Poorer managers are now on antibiotics at some state of production all the time," says Dick Loane, technical manager of the pig division of BOCM-Silcock, largest feed manufacturer in the U.K. "The good ones with tighter controls have problems, but nothing that they cannot overcome. But there are very few pig farmers who at some time don't have to bring in medicated feed or medicate through the water."

They've found that management can only do so much. Then the pigman has to have disease prevention and/or treatment available. Even good managers are already frequent users of drugs at therapeutic levels. Larger units are stretching manpower and management thinner, just as in the U.S. The result is a continuing health problem, as visits with farmers demonstrate.

Brian Selfe of Aldemoore Farm provides a good example of what can happen. While he's unable to purchase drugs or medicated feed "off the shelf," his problem is such that he's using a routine treatment program. It differs only from that of many American pork producers in that he has to obtain a prescription from his veterinarian and work through red tape to medicate his herd.

He runs a 200-sow herd, farrowing ten sows a week. He's an excellent manager as shown by his records—an average of just under 20 pigs per sow per year, including replacement gilts and open sows. He sold an average 9.48 pigs per litter in the latest six-month period, all sold at 60 lbs. as weaners.

But he has one problem: "We produce a good pig to weaning with no trouble," he explains. "Then all hell breaks loose. I don't know if it's management or what. But until we find what it is, we must have antibiotics in feed to do our job. Antibiotics are our cover."

Selfe's problem is the immediate 15 days after weaning. In early 1974, just after he'd doubled herd size to the present 200 sows, his problems began: Pigs were scouring badly, stopped growing and just looked rough. At the time, he was feeding a post-weaning ration containing copper sulfate and virginiamycin. He got a prescription from his vet and had his feed company add 200 gm./ton of Aureomycin to the post-weaning feed. "That was effective for awhile—maybe it was the weather or something, but it quit working."

He muddled along for several months with nothing other than the two growth promotants in the ration, plus injections and water medication as needed. Then he made the decision to pull out virginiamycin from all his rations, which appeared to make no difference in performance, or in his scours problem. At that point, someone—he doesn't remember who—suggested he try Quixalud, a non-antibiotic effective against E. coli and salmonella, which is cleared for growth promotion at 200 gm./ton and for therapeutic use on prescription at 600 gm.

Selfe's veterinarian provided a prescription for the special mix required for a 600 gm. level, his feed company provided the medicated feed, and he's been using it for the 15 days after weaning with every batch of pigs since. It has brought the problem under control, as several other drugs might have done at the therapeutic level.

But the important point is that now, therapeutic treatment is a routine part of Selfe's operation. He makes sure not to run out of the special mix, and as added protection, keeps a 5-lb. can of material on hand, just in case.

"This hasn't solved the problem, but it has helped," he says.

Martin Oatley finds himself in much the same situation as Selfe. His problem is a combination of gut edema and E. coli scours, however. "It became a problem last January," he explains. "We had had some problem before, but in January it became serious. We immediately began using Terramycin in water, on prescription, but it did no good. Then we went to furazolidone in the water, then in the feed when we could get it."

"That seemed to help the problem a lot, but after three months the treatment suddenly became ineffective. So we stopped using it. We used Tylan some during this same period. Then the problem cleared up for awhile, only to reappear later. We don't know what's causing it, but now as soon as we see a problem coming on, we begin a treatment program that seems to work."

The current program Oatley is using goes this way: As soon as he sees a scours or edema problem, every pig in a pen (or all pigs weaned at the same time) gets an injection of ½cc of Tribrissen (trimethoprim and sulphadiazine) every day for 3 days. In addition, neomycin is added to the feed for that pen or group of pigs for six days. The medicated feed is not premixed, nor is it kept on hand. Instead, Oatley's vet trusts him to keep a supply of neomycin on hand.

Whenever pigs start to break, he mixes up a batch of medicated feed in a 5-gallon bucket. This is a crude and inaccurate procedure, but one that works well for Oatley. Without it, he doubts he would have been able to survive through last year's rough economic situation. And today, it's a treatment he uses on almost every group of pigs.

In this case, because he's unable to pick a ready-mixed feed off the shelf, Oatley is using a program that's both time-consuming and not up to the standards he sets for the rest of his operation. Yet it's the only thing he's found that works, and he plans to stick with it as long as it does work. He guesses that regular feeding of a broad-spectrum antibiotic would solve his problem, but that's illegal.

Oatley also uses a heavily medicated diet from weaning on. His normal ration contains zinc bacitracin, arsenilic acid and copper sulfate at maximum levels cleared for growth promotion. But this combination does nothing against his scours, and other products aren't easily available. So he has to follow his program.

There are other problems with the prescription concept, too. Jeremy Skipper of Pettings Court Farm is one of the sharpest hogmen you'll meet anywhere, and an excellent manager by any standards. Until recently, he was running a 100-sow farrow to finish unit by himself, but has recently added a full-time man. One measure of his ability: Pigs reared per sow per year averages over 20 since he began the unit, and in one year he topped 24. His death loss from farrowing to 60 lbs. runs 0.9 pig per litter, including stillborn pigs. He feeds no drugs normally.

Skipper's problem came on suddenly on a Wednesday. Normally, he has no scouring problem at all in his flat-deck post-weaning pens (weaning is at three weeks). That Wednesday evening, he noticed a bit of scours, but nothing serious. The next morning, he had dead pigs, so he called the veterinarian. The veterinarian took swabs from the pigs and recommended adding Terramycin to the drinking water, pending culture and sensitivity test results.

Skipper's unit is geared for water medication, with tanks for each bank of nursery pens. So it was no problem to medicate through the water, except for coming back out every four hours to let in more water and add new medication. But Terramycin didn't help at all, and pigs continued to die. Late Friday evening, the vet called back with the test results. The problem was an E. Coli that's susceptible to furazolidone, but the vet had none on hand. Even though the next day was Saturday and it's normally impossible to obtain something like this on Saturday, the vet did locate a supply and delivered it Saturday afternoon. It went straight into the drinking water and by Sunday the scouring was under control. But Skipper was still going to the unit every four hours to add new medication.

Net loss to date: 13 pigs in a unit where he'd had no death loss previously.

"That same Saturday, we started working to get our starter-creep ration medicated with furazolidone," Skipper says. "I had a prescription, so that was no problem. But because it is a special mix, it had to be mixed at the BOCM-Silcock plant at Liverpool. I had to order 2½ tons minimum, and then, even though I work very closely with BOCM, it took two weeks for the special mix to arrive. So it cost me 13 dead pigs, plus more feed than I needed, at a higher price than I wanted to pay, to get the problem under control."

Two weeks is a bit longer than normal for obtaining a special feed mix, say feed company officials. But even at best, it takes 5 to 7 days from the time the order is placed. Plus however long it takes the veterinary surgeon to determine what drug to prescribe. The minimum required per order varies with the feed company and the mill at which it is mixed. But the bare minimum seems to be 2½ tons of complete feed. Farmers who mix their own feed don't have this problem of course. They simply obtain the drug from their veterinarian (or a pharmacist), and mix it up themselves.

The British do have some antibacterials readily available in feed—drugs that are classified as unrestricted—but they're used only for growth promotion, providing little if any therapeutic or preventative value.

"The only feed additive drugs we have readily available, we have because they're not very effective," says Dick Loane of BOCM-Silcock. "Only one has any action against gram negative bacteria—which are the ones we need to affect. The others don't do much. Most give only 1 percent or 2 percent in efficiency, which is scarcely worth the cost. But if we could use broad-spectrum antibiotics with copper, we would get twice the response in growth and feed efficiency."

All antibacterials are available for therapeutic use on prescription, of course. But they're available in feed only on special order, in minimum amounts of 2½ tons generally. And obtaining them involves waiting for the order to be made and delivered—a long wait during a serious disease outbreak.

There are other problems with the system, as well. Obtaining a prescription is ordinarily no big problem. But it can mean a veterinary call that would be unnecessary otherwise—just one more added expense. And there's a black market of sorts in some antibiotics. Although it's difficult to learn details, many veterinarians admit to having seen bags of restricted drugs at pig units they visit.

It's obvious to the American observer that the U.K. approach to limiting use of broad-spectrum drugs has created difficulties for producers. While they're not insurmountable problems for the most part, and can be lived with with no great expense, the same would not be the case in the United States.

In the first place, the American hog producer would have no efficient alternative for growth promotion—he has become largely dependent on antibiotics. Copper sulfate allowed the British to go from wide use of drugs to a very limited use without the farmer suffering economically. American producers would suddenly find themselves with no growth promotants, and a subsequent drop in performance, production and profits.

In some respects, converting to prescription on therapeutic and prophylactic drugs such as Aureo-SP-250 and Tylan-Sulfa would be a much harder blow to American producers. While they would be available on prescription, that would mean most producers would not be able to use them until a problem had shown up and could be diagnosed. This would likely mean increased pig mortality, followed by lower rates of gain and feed efficiency, all piled on top of a more severe disease situation.

Size would also be a problem. Larger British units are having some health problems, in spite of their more intensive management. Most felt the problems were due to management—after they'd supposedly tightened down on management, facilities, and other factors that are supposed to make it easier to do without drugs. So it would seem that the average American producer could look forward to problems, as well, while the large unit would face a great many problems.

There's no doubt that U.S. use of drugs overcomes lack of management time. But as common as scours, pneumonia and other health problems are now, it's almost impossible to visualize what would happen without the products we now depend on to keep these under control. Certainly restrictions on drug use would lead to smaller units, an increase in therapeutic treatment, higher costs of production and less efficient use of feed, higher death loss, and a higher labor requirement.

Given restrictions on drugs such as those in the U.K., American hogmen would find themselves using more feed and capital to produce fewer slaughter hogs in smaller units at a higher cost. Learning to do that would provide very expensive lessons for pork producers.

Dick Loane of BOCM-Silcock says, "I've seen the U.S. situation, and would not swap our setup for yours. You use such massive amounts of antibiotics that if you dropped them, you would have a catastrophe." ●

THE CAREER WOMAN IN GOVERNMENT: WHAT IS HER FUTURE?

HON. GLADYS NOON SPELLMAN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mrs. SPELLMAN. Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of interest and emphasis, these days on "upward mobility" for women, both in government and in the private sector. For this reason, I would like to share with my colleagues a recent speech by Alan K. Campbell, Chairman of the U.S. Civil Service Commission, before the National Council of Career Women. Mr. Campbell outlined the reform legislation now before the Congress and commented on the measures the Commission was taking or drafting, to make the Federal career service more "hospitable" to the talents of women. The National Council of Career Women is a nonprofit membership organization providing career guidance and development for women in order to make them better prepared for "upward mobility."

The speech follows:

THE CAREER WOMAN IN GOVERNMENT: WHAT IS HER FUTURE?

I very much appreciate the opportunity to talk with you about the future of career women in government.

Any consideration, of course, of women in government must be based on two sides of an equation: the individual initiative required to develop, to learn, to grow, and, the employers' responsibilty—in this case, the Federal Government—to supply opportunities, training, and rewards.

Focusing on the employer's part of the equation I will discuss here some programs already underway, and the President's proposals for personnel reform and reorganization—what these mean to you as a career woman, and as a concerned citizen.

It is a truism that the government as employer must fulfill special roles which the private-sector employer need not consider. Among these, sometimes acknowledged, sometimes not, is government's role as a model employer. To take just one example, quite clearly, the government has no business prescribing employment standards in the private sector which it flaunts in its own personnel management.

It would appear, however, that government has often failed in the model role. At best, it has been a reflection of its times, and continues to reflect its times.

A special report we just did last month found that women hold 35 percent of all Federal jobs, compared to 36 percent in the nation's total labor force.

Side by side comparisons of salaries for women in public and private industry are hard to come by, but we do know that in both sectors women hold an unsought monopoly on the lower paying, less responsible jobs: Women hold 68 percent of the Federal jobs in grades one through eight.

As we move to the mid and upper levels, we find fewer women at each step along the way—about 22 percent in grades 9 through 12, about 6 percent in grades 13 through 15, and only 3.2 percent in the supergrades 16 through 18; that last total is at least up from the previous year's high of 2.8 percent!

We are especially concerned about the scanty representation of women in grades 13 through 15 since these comprise the "feeder group," the ranks which produce tomorrow's executives.

Since Federal managers tend to fill top jobs almost exclusively from within, the paucity of women in the "feeder" grades makes it extremely unlikely that the supergrade situation for women will improve markedly so long as we hold to present staffing habits. For example, last year 11 times as many employees were promoted to GS–13 as were hired from outside of government. My point is, when we make progress at the feeder level, we can hope for later progress at the top.

I should stress, as well, that reaching the upper ranks through promotion is a long slow process, even in a "growth economy." Today, it represents an even more tortuous, uncertain route, since the Federal work force has seen little expansion since 1972—consequently, there are fewer top jobs to be filled.

In the non-career service, where upper grade people can more readily be hired from outside government, the picture is somewhat brighter for women. Sixteen percent of this administration's non-career executive appointments have been women, and their representation in non-career supergrade jobs has doubled over the past year.

Nevertheless, anyone aspiring to the career service, or anyone interested in the health of the career service, which comprises 92 percent of Federal jobs, should be concerned about these lopsided statistics. Indeed, this is one of the many issues we are tackling as we move forward in personnel reform.

As you know, we began to examine the personnel system a year ago, and reform legislation is now before Congress. Hearings have been completed in both the House and the Senate. With markup now in progress, we have every expectation that we will see a bill reported well before the session ends.

But before I outline that legislation, let me highlight some measures we are already taking, or drafting, to make the Federal career service more hospitable to the talents of able women, to get women and minorities out of the "basement of public service," and increase their numbers at all levels.

The first of these is the Presidential Management Intern Program. Our purpose is to attract outstanding young men and women, well educated and committed to public management. They bring to government new graduate degrees in public management at a time when creative management is sorely needed.

On completing their two-year internships, they may receive competitive civil service status. They start at GS–9, and are eligible for promotion during their internships. Close to 1,000 highly qualified people were nominated for the first year of the program, and 250 were selected. It is particularly gratifying that 46 percent of the finalists are women.

These interns, I might add, are in great demand, for there are more billets than the 250 who can be hired in a given year.

Another promising new opportunity is a graduate co-op education (or work-study) program extending the existing undergraduate program to graduate and associate degree students. It could provide as many as 10,000 internship-like positions yearly. Students are paid for career-related work assignments in Federal agencies while still in college. If they meet certain requirements, they may enter the career service non-competitively. This program will open still more doors for women in the public service.

We have done extensive work to develop a Special Emphasis Program, in which agencies will be authorized to appoint women and minorities through special procedures in an occupation where they are underrepresented. The program is clearly experimental, and if it does not produce good results it will be abandoned. We feel experimentation is necessary, however, because current procedures have not resulted in a Federal work force that appropriately reflects the nation's diversity.

The plan would permit a variety of selection methods, providing competition on the basis of education, experience, and performance. Those selected would, in effect, be taking a two-year on-the-job performance test. If successful, they will enter the career service.

The plan is positive and innovative. However, there are things it would not do:

It would not create new jobs, or set up parallel systems outside the personnel mainstream . . . rather, candidates will occupy regular positions which are temporarily designated for these so-called Schedule A jobs.

It would not choose candidates on nonmerit factors, such as race, color, creed, sex, national origin, or handicap . . . appointments under the excepted authority would be open to all candidates.

I'd like to point out that the Special Emphasis Program is designed for hiring new employees. In no way is it a replacement for upward mobility. Nevertheless, women already in Federal jobs could compete through special methods and be selected for higher grade positions.

Let me briefly mention Upward Mobility, which began to work in a meaningful way with passage of the EEO Act of 1972.

Its basic principle is that some employees in dead-end jobs, GS–9 and below, have the potential for more rewarding positions, but not the qualifications. How do we tap this potential?

Target jobs must be identified, the employee must have counseling, there must be training to get the employee qualified for the better job, and, finally, each participant's progress must be carefully evaluated.

Participants in the Upward Mobility Program are predominantly women since most of the dead-end jobs are held by women, and the program has helped them. From 1972 through 1975, an estimated 60,000 employees moved to career occupations, some reassigned, some promoted. And in 1976 alone, the latest year for which we have solid information, over 70,000 were either promoted or reassigned to new careers.

What about mobility for the mid-level woman?

Just as there is a difficult gap to be bridged at the GS–4 through 9 range, another stopping point for women is at the GS–11 through 13 levels.

Women who reach the "full performance" (formerly journeyman) level of their jobs, and are excellent technicians in their fields, find that they are not being considered for promotion to management jobs. I have just asked the Commission's Federal Women's Program, working with our Bureau of Training and an interagency task force, to map out a meaningful career development ladder for such women.

We expect these positive steps not to undermine merit, but enhance it—a concept that has clearly been violated in a system which has 92 percent white males and 3 percent women at its top levels.

I am pleased to report to you, as well, that plans to move a substantial portion of CSC's responsibilities for EEO and affirmative action to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission are progressing well. Reorganization Plan I, mandating such a transfer, was recently cleared by Congress, and we have worked closely with both the White House and the EEOC to ensure that civil service reform and EEO reorganization are mutually supportive.

Now let me turn to the civil service reform drive, and specific aspects of the legislation.

There are some who maintain that the proposed personnel reform and reorganization is simply another Washington game of musical chairs.

Not true! We are proposing to simplify the complex personnel system, remove the inconsistencies, and speed up the process.

The basic civil service law, written in 1883, is still on the books. Certainly, the system has evolved, with a law here, and an Executive order there.

The tragedy of it all is that the changes have added more and more protections, against abuse and against arbitrariness, but there have been literally no changes designed to make it more possible for a manager to manage! So this reform reflects the first time the system as a whole has been studied, and solutions devised to match the problems.

The two legislative instruments which we're proposing are the Civil Service Reorganization Plan, or Reorganization Plan 2, which went to Congress today, and the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978, submitted to Congress on March 2.

The Reorganization Plan would split the Civil Service Commission into three agencies, namely:

The Office of Personnel Management which would help the President manage government's human resources, as does the Office of Management and Budget in managing government's finances.

The Merit Systems Protection Board which would be an independent agency to hear employee appeals, empowered to punish violators or abusers of the system.

The Federal Labor Relations Authority which would pull together several programs, and function for Federal workers much as the National Labor Relations Board does for private sector workers.

Let's get to the heart of these civil service reform proposals. The bill sent to Congress on March 2 contains the changes requiring specific Congressional action. It would:

Put into law the basic principles of the Federal personnel system. With the rules in a single law—rather than a hodgepodge of Executive orders, rules, legal precedents, and diverse statutes—we stand a far better chance of enforcing them. And, we are also providing the means to punish those who violate the rules.

Improve performance evaluation. The present system for appraising employee performance is an exercise in futility. Ninety-nine percent of all Federal employees receive the same rating—satisfactory. We would require each agency to develop its own performance appraisal system, tailored to its needs.

Allow agencies more authority. This should result in quicker decisions, since agencies won't need to go through the Office of Personnel Management on every personnel decision. That office would, of course, oversee the agency's actions.

Increase the range of choices in hiring decisions. The "rule-of-three" asks for our testing methods to make finer distinctions they now can provide. We therefore are proposing to allow a choice from the top seven candidates, or from an even wider range if circumstances merit. We want to be sure candidates have equal chances.

Provide incentive pay for mid-level managers and supervisors. By tieing pay increases to performance—not time in service—for managers and supervisors at the GS–13 through 15 levels, we would be adding greater motivation for those officials who are so crucial to improved government productivity.

Improve employee appeals procedures. This would put teeth in the Merit Systems Protection Board, giving enforcement authority to act against abusers of the system. It would also ensure appeal rights to all Federal employees, and would define circumstances when an agency whose decision was reversed would have to pay the appealing employee's costs.

Better use of the talents of top managers. We propose to create a Senior Executive Service with possibilities of greater pay for superior performance, as well as possibilities of easier removal for marginal performance. SES officials could be placed wherever their talents could be best used—regardless of agency. The greater risks would balance the greater benefits, but there would also be a fallback right to a GS–15 position for any career executive removed from an SES position.

Modify veterans preference to concentrate on those who need and most deserve these benefits, and to alleviate the adverse effects on women's opportunities. I've saved this issue for the last, since I would like to dwell on it.

Up until this administration took office, the topic of veterans preference was pretty much like the weather—everybody talked about it, but no one did much about it.

Such an attitude is unfair on the face of it. It serves no one's cause to leave rumor unchecked, charges unsubstantiated.

The fact that a heated controversy—should I say fight—on veterans preference could put the entire civil service reform package in jeopardy did not contravene, in our view, the need to get this issue out in the open, and to press for change.

Among the many documents and facts, now available, let me refer to just a few.

According to GAO, in a September 1977 report to Congress, because of veterans preference (and the appointment law, now repealed) many highly qualified women can't be certified for employment. Some women, said the report, with perfect or near-perfect scores, currently rank behind veterans with much lower scores. Non-veteran women need substantial extra qualifications to surmount veterans preference barriers.

The conflict, I might note, became more vivid during the 14 public hearings we held last year. One manager in California, for example, reported that his hiring effort for an entire year was wiped out, when, in a reduction in force, the veterans were retained and the women and minorities were "laid off," to use his expression.

The result of veterans preference is that half the Federal work force is veterans, and only 35 percent are women. Looking at grades, 65 percent of the supergrades are veterans, while 3.2 percent are women.

We propose to limit preference for non-disabled veterans to ten years after leaving the service. For retired military personnel, preference would be even more limited. Anyone retiring under the rank of major would receive preference for only three years after separation; those in the ranks of major or above would receive no preference.

During a reduction in force, non-disabled veterans would retain preference over competing employes only during the first three years after their first appointment. After that, non-disabled veterans' only advantage in RIF's would be a five-year credit added to their length of service computation.

I would point out that any contemplated reduction in veterans benefits would apply only to non-disabled vets. The disabled would continue to receive lifetime preference. In fact, we are proposing to make it even easier for disabled veterans to get Federal employment. Moreover, there would be special benefits for Vietnam era veterans.

Some States are already in the forefront of modifying veterans preference. In Oregon, State officials are already seeing more women and minorities on the certificates although the law was just passed in 1977. No doubt, we will find more women on Federal registers too, when the law is changed.

In closing, before I gird myself to answer the questions of this excellent panel assembled here, let me add a personal note.

To women who are building Federal careers, or who, as private citizens, are watching the Federal Government's drive for a more representative civil service, I would say the coming decades will indeed be years of controversy and challenge. Women are on the brink of a new world in Federal employment. Our goal of true equal opportunity will not be achieved next year or the year after. Passing a law or issuing a regulation alone cannot change a tradition quickly. But the path has been cleared; the design completed.

Whatever measures the Congress approves, I can assure you that we will persevere in our drive to rebuild and modernize the civil service system. We count on your support.●

BEEF INDEMNIFICATION ACT OF 1978

HON. EDWARD R. MADIGAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce legislation today for the purpose of discouraging the President from further harming the domestic beef industry. My bill would achieve this purpose by requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to issue indemnity payments to cattle producers for economic losses incurred whenever the President acts to increase or suspend meat import quotas for any reason other than as part of an international agreement to expand agricultural exports from the United States.

The indemnity payments to the eligible producers would be calculated based on the difference in the price of cattle 120 days immediately preceding the President's announcement of import increases and the price of cattle 120 days immediately following the announcement of import increases.

President Carter's announcement on June 8, 1978, to increase meat imports by 200 million pounds has caused grave concerns among consumers, cattlemen, and corn growers.

The consumers are concerned about the President's decision because, in the future, as foreign supplies of beef tighten and U.S. cattle production decreases, beef prices may rise to a higher level than they are at the present.

The cattlemen are justifiably concerned since the price of fed cattle in feedlots across the country dropped from above $60 to less than $50 after the President's announcement. Thus, resulting in disastrous economic losses to the cattle industry who were just beginning to recover from a 5-year cycle of low prices and inflationary costs.

Corn growers will be adversely affected because the President's actions will decrease domestic cattle production, and thus reduce demand for corn and feedgrains.

Furthermore, the President's decision will adversely affect the balance-of-payments situation. The U.S. trade deficit for 1978 is projected to be a record $40 billion, an increase of $13 billion from 1977. It is estimated the 200 million pound increased beef imports will add further to that deficit.

In summation, I think the President's decision to increase meat imports by 200 million pounds was wrong because there will be no long term reduction in beef prices or inflation, but rather an increase in both with the undesirable possibility of costly cattle Government price support programs if cattle producers are denied reasonable profits in the marketplace. Therefore, it is my hope that this bill, the Beef Indemnification Act, will discourage the President from increasing meat import quotas in the future. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.●

MAYOR GEORGE R. MOSCONE OF SAN FRANCISCO AND AIRPORTS DIRECTOR HEATH URGE APPROVAL OF THE AIRPORT AND AIRCRAFT NOISE REDUCTION ACT AS PRESENTED BY PUBLIC WORKS AND TRANSPORTATION AND WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEES

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, we would like to call to the attention of our colleagues a copy of a mailgram sent to some of us by Mayor George R. Moscone of San Francisco, accompanied by a longer message from Richard R. Heath, director of airports, San Francisco International Airport. Both strongly support the incorporation and approval, as requested by our respective committees, of H.R. 11986, Ways and Means, as title III of H.R. 8729, Public Works and Transportation, the Airport and Aircraft Noise Reduction Act, both of which are now pending before the Rules Committee.

The City of San Francisco badly needs passage of H.R. 11986, formerly H.R. 8729, Congressman Glenn Anderson's Bill. We urge you to prevent its being bottled up in the Rules Committee. I will not repeat the arguments forwarded to you by our Airports Director, Richard Heath. But I strongly request that you carefully consider his position and do whatever is necessary to permit the Bill to reach the House Floor. It is essential to this City's Airport which serves all of Northern California.

GEORGE R. MOSCONE,
Mayor of San Francisco.

I cannot stress sufficiently the urgency of the need for passage of H.R. 11986, formerly H.R. 8729, Congressman Glenn Anderson's Bill. This Airport, like most other major airports, is faced with massive costs for property acquisition or property easements if the aircraft fleet is not retrofitted or replaced with less noisy aircraft in the reasonably near future. Airport proprietors of this nation have been working diligently with Congress and the FAA for many years to bring about passage of this greatly needed legislation. It would be tragic indeed if these years of work were scuttled by the House Rules Committee through a refusal to allow this Bill to reach the House Floor.

We fully support Title III of this Bill which provides monetary assistance to the Airlines in paying for the conversion of their fleets on an accelerated basis. The funding mechanism provided is totally consistent with the long-established policy that the Air Transport industry should be paid for by the users of that industry. Air passengers and air shippers, and not the general public, pay the charge that creates the Trust Fund. Providing the airlines this financial assistance out of that Trust Fund will assure their compliance with the deadlines provided. Without this assistance you and all other members of Congress will be subjected to intensive pressure by the Airlines to relax the compliance dates so that they may utilize the older, noisier aircraft longer.

HR 11986 constitutes a fragile compromise agreement between all segments of the air transport industry, the traveling public and the airport neighbors who are affected by aircraft noise. If HR 11986 is stalled by the Rules Committee, that compromise will likely distintegrate. The result will unquestionably be a proliferation of legal actions nationwide requiring airports to buy up residential properties near airports. We estimate that the probable total cost to San Francisco Airport alone will exceed the total funding provided in Title III. Let's not kid ourselves that the Aviation Trust Fund will not be tapped for most of this cost. HR 11986 thus makes good sense from the economic standpoint alone. Failure to pass it will result in far higher costs in land acquisitions in the years to come. Failure to pass it will result in a boon to the lawyers bringing and defending those lawsuits, but will be a serious blow to airports, airport neighbors and to the traveling public.

We urge you to take immediate action to refer this Bill to the House Floor before that fragile compromise, painfully constructed over many years, comes apart at the seams.

RICHARD R. HEATH,
Director of Airports,
San Francisco International Airport.●

THE TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO DEBATE, NO. 2

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an exchange of "Dear Colleague" letters on the issue of whether or not the administration has acted in a manner which has undermined the effectiveness of the embargo and has signaled Turkey that it need not take the embargo seriously.

Following is a letter from the proponents of keeping the arms embargo against Turkey in which it is contended that the administration has been unwilling or unable to make the embargo work. In a second letter, I have tried to counter this argument and state why the embargo has not worked. I mention that there have been many U.S. efforts over the last 3 years to try to achieve progress towards a Cyprus settlement.

The two letters follow:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July, 1978.

UNDERMINING THE EMBARGO

DEAR COLLEAGUE: In imposing an embargo on American military aid to Turkey after Turkey's August, 1974, invasion and occupation of Cyprus, Congress had in mind two basic considerations:

The first was the need to enforce American law, which required that further military assistance to Turkey be terminated after American-supplied weapons were used by Turkey for offensive purposes on Cyprus.

The second consideration, and the focus of this letter, was the expectation that the Administration would use the embargo to convince Turkey of the need to take substantive actions to promote a just settlement on Cyprus.

Regrettably, the Administration has failed to do so.

Instead, this Administration, like the one which preceded it, has acted in a manner which has undermined the effectiveness of the embargo and has signaled Turkey that it need not take the embargo seriously.

The following brief summary of Carter Administration actions and statements concerning Cyprus—many of which have received little or no publicity in this country—makes this conclusion obvious. The summary also makes clear that the Administration's request that the embargo be lifted "because it hasn't worked" stands logic on its head: the embargo has not worked because the Administration has been unwilling or unable to make it work.

We think it essential, therefore, that the following facts be kept in mind in considering the Administration's justification for attempting to lift the embargo:

The Administration's first request for arms for Turkey, submitted by the State Department in March of 1977, sought a level of military assistance many times the level supplied by the previous Administration. This request, you may recall, engendered strong opposition and was ultimately substantially reduced. Turkey nonetheless received a forty percent increase in military sales (from $125 to $175 million) from 1977 to 1978 although it had taken no positive action whatsoever on Cyprus. The hope that this significant increase would induce such positive action on the part of Turkey proved empty.

The Department of Defense resorted to a little-known agency—the NATO Maintenance and Supply Agency (NAMSA)—located in Luxembourg, to supply Turkey with nearly $30 million of weapons beyond the restrictions in American law limiting the amount of military sales. Despite the vigorous protests of several Members, including the Chairman of the Subcommittee on Europe of the House International Relations Committee, who termed the action "a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the law", this circumvention of the military sales limitation continues.

The United States Mission to the United Nations, in an effort to avoid "offending" Turkey, voted with a very small minority last fall to weaken a General Assembly resolution which simply called for action toward a settlement on Cyprus.

The State Department submitted last February a report on human rights in Turkey and in Cyprus which was a deliberate whitewash of Turkish practices in both those countries. A State Department spokesman was quoted at the time as saying that the Department did not want to report anything which might make it more difficult to get Congress to approve lifting the embargo.

The United States Ambassador to Turkey declared in news interviews in Ankara, during the time when the Administration still claimed to support the embargo, that "the embargo doesn't serve any American interest," that "without changing the law (which prohibits United States arms to aggressor countries) I would like to find some way around it," and that "my only hope is that . . . it (the embargo) will be removed." High-ranking U.S. military officers made similar statements in the past eighteen months and thereby encouraged Turkish intransigence with regard to a just settlement on Cyprus. Obviously, the arms limitation could not be effective when the Turkish government heard high American officials publicly contradict the Administration's own policy on this issue.

The Secretary of State assured Members of Congress several months ago that before the Administration made any decision on whether to reverse its field and ask for a lifting of the embargo, the Administration would carefully study the actions and proposals expected from Turkey to insure that they represented substantive progress toward a Cyprus settlement. But the Administration soon backed down and—before Turkey had taken any action, indeed, before the Turkish proposals had even been submitted, let alone examined—asked for the lifting of the embargo anyway.

Not surprisingly, with all incentive to take actions on a Cyprus settlement having been eliminated, Turkey took no actions at all. Moreover, its proposals were so poor as to be regarded throughout the diplomatic community as virtually meaningless.

This sorry record shows clearly why the embargo "hasn't worked": these—and other—actions of the Administration have undermined it. The Administration has failed abysmally to convince Turkey that greater flexibility on Cyprus is essential to the resumption of a full military relationship with the United States. As a remedy for its own failure, the Administration now asks Congress to abandon principle and to ignore the clear requirements of American law. This we must not do.

We ask you, therefore, to join us in demonstrating that Congress, a co-equal branch of our government, believes in enforcing our laws by supporting the effective use of the arms embargo against Turkey.

Sincerely,

Dante B. Fascell, Edward J. Derwinski, Benjamin S. Rosenthal, John Brademas, Charles Rose, Parren J. Mitchell, Norman Y. Mineta, Paul E. Tsongas, Donald M. Fraser, James J. Blanchard, Barbara A. Mikulski, Benjamin A. Gilman, Mario Biaggi, George M. O'Brien, John L. Burton, Robert W. Edgar, Wyche Fowler, Jr., James J. Florio, Norman E. D'Amours, Martin A. Russo, Charles B. Rangel.

COMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

DEAR COLLEAGUE: This letter is in response to the second letter sent to you by the proponents of keeping the arms embargo against Turkey. Their second letter addresses the issue of whether the Administration undermined the embargo and whether it was unwilling or unable to make the embargo work.

Arguments made by the proponents of keeping the arms embargo against Turkey:

1. This Administration has acted in a manner which has undermined the effectiveness of the embargo and has signaled Turkey that it need not take the embargo seriously.

Counter:

1. The fundamental reason why Turkey has not acted more to promote a Cyprus settlement while the embargo has been in force is because, as a proud and independent nation, Turkey is not going to "buckle" under to American pressure.

Turkey has so stated publicly. The more we exert public pressure, the less likely will Turkey act. Turkey did not refuse to act on Cyprus because the Administration undermined the embargo.

2. If the proponents' argument were true, then continuing the embargo means continuing the status quo, which we all agree is unacceptable.

If it is true that the embargo has not worked because the Administration has been unwilling to make it work (we would acknowledge that neither this Administration nor the preceding one had enthusiasm for the embargo), then we cannot expect that attitude to change if the embargo continues. And if the attitude of the Administration does not change, we cannot hope for improvement in the situation if the embargo remains.

Proponents of the embargo argue that we have not had any progress on Cyprus but that we should continue the same policy.

I conclude the opposite: we have not made progress because we have pursued a policy that has not worked. Therefore, we need to try a new approach.

3. The Administration has complied with the embargo and made many good faith efforts to try to achieve substantial progress towards a Cyprus settlement.

A detailed list is available of over 100 contacts held since July 1974 in which the Administration strenuously urged the Turks of the necessity to be more forthcoming in order to achieve substantial progress toward a Cyprus settlement. There have been some important achievements, including an agreement between the Cypriot communities over the broad outlines of a settlement.

But a Cyprus settlement will require negotiations between the two communities on the island, which have proved very difficult while the embargo has been in effect.

The Administration acknowledges that Turkey was able to make a few purchases while the embargo was in effect from the NATO Maintenance and Supply Agency (NAMSA). Turkish NAMSA purchases have now been stopped and the loophole has been closed except for small purchases involving NATO partnerships over which NAMSA and the U.S. have little control.

The question of how hard the Administration worked to enforce the embargo is not now the relevant question. For whatever reasons, the embargo has not worked and lingering with it longer will only continue the existing, unacceptable situation.

I hope you agree that a new approach should be tried, and that the embargo should be lifted.

Sincerely,

LEE H. HAMILTON, M.C.●

A GOOD INFLATION FIGHTER

HON. JOHN J. RHODES

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, the mark of a truly good elected representative is his ability to recognize and support the good ideas of others, as well as having good ideas himself.

My colleague and friend from Arizona, Congressman ELDON RUDD, is a man with such ability.

As a first-term Member of Congress, ELDON has introduced and cosponsored many worthwhile pieces of legislation that would benefit the American people. Many of these bills were inspired by his senior colleagues, who are experts on economic, budget, and Government policy, and other important issues facing our Nation.

By supporting and helping to promote these good ideas, so that they gain wider acceptance by the public and his colleagues, ELDON RUDD has proved himself to be a good inflation fighter, through attempts legislatively to balance the Federal budget, stop deficit spending, cut taxes, and reduce overburdensome Federal regulatory control.

It is a tribute to him, and to the people of Arizona's Fourth Congressional District who elected him, that he has achieved such an excellent record of legislative accomplishment, which has been recognized by his peers as well as by citizen and opinion leaders.

I know that I speak for a great many of his senior colleagues in Congress when I say that ELDON RUDD has earned our respect and admiration as a very capable representative.

ELDON's initiative and ability in proposing and supporting good legislation during his first term in Congress has been recognized editorially by the Phoenix Gazette, Arizona's largest statewide afternoon newspaper. I would like to include the Phoenix Gazette editorial in the RECORD to underscore Congressman RUDD's record of legislative accomplishments.

[From the Phoenix Gazette, July 24, 1978]

INFLATION ANTIDOTES

While the Carter administration is casting around for means of controlling the increasing rate of inflation, there are measures sitting in Congress that would provide means to this end.

Rep. Eldon Rudd, R-Ariz., is co-sponsor of many of these bills, and, as he pointed out recently, heavy taxation is only part of the total problem. The federal government uses tax money to build bureaucracies, which, in turn, find regulatory work to do. This adds almost $100 billion a year to the cost of producing products and services. This cost, of course, is borne by consumers who had the displeasure of financing all the overseeing in the first place.

Rudd is co-sponsoring legislation to cut taxes, require a firm ceiling for federal spending, to prohibit federal deficits and require balanced budgets. A look at taxation at all levels from 1967 to 1977 reveals the crying need for this reform.

State and local income taxes went up 405 percent. Property taxes increased by 132 percent. Sales taxes are up 199 percent, and corporate taxes rose by 112 percent. Social Security taxes jumped by 220 percent, and federal income taxes are up 125 percent.

Whatever the worth of a dollar earned, only 53 percent of it is real. The total tax bite is 47 cents on the dollar—dangerously close to one-half.

Inflation is Washington's chief export, and only at the source can this be stemmed. The means are available.●

THE UNITED STATES SHOULD HONOR THE MEMORY OF DRAJA MIHAILOVICH

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, hundreds of American fighter pilots who were shot down by the Nazis over Yugoslavia during World War II owe their lives and their freedom to a Yugoslav patriot, now dead, by the name of Gen. Draja Mihailovich.

Mihailovich rescued and gave refuge to these American servicemen, and they now seek congressional support to honor his memory.

The problem is that the State Department is lobbying against legislation, sponsored by Senator STROM THURMOND, which has already passed the Senate, because Mihailovich was a political enemy of Yugoslav dictator Tito, who had Mihailovich shot after he came to power.

Senator THURMOND's bill, now bottled up in the House Administration Committee, would require the Secretary of Interior to permit the National Committee of American Airmen Rescued by General Mihailovich to construct and maintain a monument to this valiant Yugoslav patriot.

The Arizona Republic has recently editorialized that Congress should forget about the State Department's unwarranted nervousness about offending dictator Tito, and pass the Mihailovich memorial legislation.

I wholeheartedly agree with that position, and commend that Republic's editorial to all my House colleagues. I would like to insert the editorial at this point in the RECORD:

[From the Arizona Republic, July 24, 1978]

TITO'S TANTRUM

Since the closing days of World War II, the name of Draja Mihailovich has been treated in official American quarters as some despicable family scandal. It simply isn't mentioned if anyone can help it.

But just as assiduously, a small and dwindling group of World War II fliers has been trying to elevate Mihailovich's name to heroic public proportions.

No one denies Mihailovich deserves hero recognition. But international diplomacy has gotten involved, and everyone knows that the politics of diplomacy frequently ignore logic or justice.

Mihailovich was the World War II Yugoslav patriot who took to isolated mountain hideways, and tied up thousands of Nazi soldiers with guerrilla raids on occupied Axis territory.

While in the mountains, Mihailovich and his Chetnik followers hid more than 500 American fliers who had been shot down behind Nazi lines. Most of them were airlifted to safety by the Chetniks.

But if Mihailovich hated Nazis, he also hated an old Yugolsav political foe worse—Josip Tito.

Unfortunately for Mihailovich, the Allies sided with Tito after the war, and presided over his installation as Yugoslavia's leader.

Mihailovich was arrested by Tito in 1948, tried for treason—a euphemism for opposing Tito—and shot.

Enter the ex-fliers who owe their lives to Mihailovich.

For years, they've been trying to move Congress into approving a monument for the executed Mihailovich.

What has happened every year is precisely what is happening this year, as another bill honoring Mihailovich bogs down in Congress.

Tito objects to the United States honoring the old nemesis whose fame he tried to wipe out with the firing squad.

As Washington columnist Jack Anderson reported recently, American Ambassador Lawrence Eagleburger was ushered to the Yugoslav foreign ministry, and handed an "energetic protest" about Congress creating a posthumous honor to Mihailovich.

The State Department also has joined in the hand-wringing, speculating that a monument to the Chetnik patriot would create "extreme umbrage" on the part of the Tito regime.

Such nonsense.

The United States should tell Tito where to get off.

Congress is not proposing that it honor the politics of Mihailovich. It is honoring the memory of a man, regardless of his Yugoslav politics, who risked his life to save the lives of hundreds of Americans.

The honor should be established, and let Tito vent his rage.

More to the point, there is a dramatic irony involved in this issue.

The American government is cowering in fear over the "extreme umbrage" that might be expressed if it honors a man who defied fear to save others.●

THE KEMP-ROTH BILL

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following: Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to an editorial published in the July 23, 1978, edition of the Arizona Republic, the largest newspaper in my State. The editorial is a ringing and articulate denunciation of the Kemp-Roth tax cut bill. This editorial is significant because for decades, the Republic has been a consistent, aggressive and conscientious champion of conservative politics. Their editorials always have been in the best tradition of American journalism—direct and forthright. Sometimes the Republic and I have been on opposite sides of an issue, and sometimes not. But I think in this instance they have taken a particularly courageous stand, and the newspaper deserves commendation. I recommend the editorial to my colleagues.

INFLATIONARY PROPOSAL

With the echoes of California's tax revolt still reverberating through Capitol Hill, a bill to cut personal income taxes by 33 percent over the next three years, and corporate taxes, as well, is gaining momentum in Congress.

The bill, introduced by Rep. Jack Kemp, R-N.Y., and Sen. William Roth, R-Del., already has won the endorsement of 176 congressmen. Bill Brock, chairman of the Republican National Committee, has called it a top GOP priority.

Since no legislator has ever failed re-election because he voted for a tax cut, there is a chance that Congress will pass the bill. President Carter has said that, if Congress does, he will veto it.

In this, the president has proved himself a truer conservative than Kemp, Roth, Brock, et al, men who call themselves conservatives. For the bill is Keynesianism run amok.

Kemp and Roth argue that cutting taxes by a third would generate so much new investment and create so many new jobs that, within a year or two, government revenues would rise to a point where the budget would come into balance, even without a cut in the budget.

As evidence, they cite what happened after the Kennedy-Johnson tax cut. The economy did expand, and the increased revenues resulting from that expansion did put the Treasury into the black.

Voila! they say. The same thing would happen again.

The fallacy lies in the fact that 1978 is not 1963. The economy was then in the doldrums, running well below capacity. There was no shortage of skilled labor. And, most important of all, the rate of inflation was a miniscule 1.4 percent.

Today, we are enjoying 40 straight months of economic expansion, the longest such period in the history of the nation. Many industries are running at capacity or very near it. There is a growing shortage of skilled labor.

And inflation, during the second quarter of the year, was running at the horrendous annual rate of 10 percent.

As Walter W. Heller, the architect of the Kennedy-Johnson tax cut, has pointed out, it did not lead to increased capital investment, as Kemp and Roth seem to believe, but to increased consumer demand, which took up the slack in the economy.

There's no slack now. Pouring billions of dollars into the hands of consumers will simply send prices sky high. The nation will start looking back at 10 percent inflation with longing.

There is a need for a tax cut to stimulate capital investment, for that is the weakest spot in the economy. Industry is not spending nearly enough on new plants and equipment.

However, the need is for a tax cut specifically designed for the purpose of encouraging such expenditures—a decrease in the corporate tax and in the capital gains tax, a rise in the investment tax credit, the end of double taxation of dividends, a change in the method of computing depreciation.

Politically, it would be impossible to enact any of these measures without giving individuals tax relief, too, and that should be done, but not in the meat-ax way that Kemp and Roth propose.

A 33 percent cut in the federal income tax could have no other result than runaway inflation.●

VIETNAM VETERANS

HON. LESTER L. WOLFF

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 28, 1978

● Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Speaker, the problem of veterans employment is a serious one. As I'm sure you realize, Vietnam veterans are often the last hired and the first fired. Furthermore, the economic recession of 1975 brought veterans' unemployment to an all time high.

Consequently, Congresswoman MARGARET M. HECKLER and myself have produced what we hope will be a fruitful analysis of the current situation facing the veterans. We hope our recommendations will prove worthwhile and appropriate action will be taken. It is for this reason that we wish to bring the report to the attention of the colleagues.

VETERANS EMPLOYMENT—ANALYSIS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

(By LESTER L. WOLFF and MARGARET M. HECKLER)

Veterans' unemployment is primarily counter-cyclical rather than structural. Vietnam veterans' and disabled veterans' underemployment is both structural and countercyclical. In 1973 when veterans' unemployment reached its lowest level (4.9 percent), then President Nixon declared that "veterans' unemployment is no longer a national problem." The economic recession of 1975 brought veterans' unemployment to an all-time high (10.5 percent). The average Vietnam veteran is now 31 years old. He has a wife and two children, and a high school education. The veteran is seeking a secure and meaningful career in the private sector commensurate with his peers who did not serve in the military.

Vietnam veterans are often the last hired and first fired. Many lack the training and skills necessary to acquire careers equal to their abilities and aspirations. A viable solution to the unemployment and training of the disabled and Vietnam veterans lies in the private sector, not in subsidized public service employment. Effective private sector career training initiatives and interfaced with Veterans Administration Apprenticeship On-the-Job Training (OJT) and cooperative benefits should be the primary solution to the employment and training needs of the disabled and Vietnam veteran. The substantial potential that lies in the HIRE II program may be lost because there is not sufficient technical assistance, training, and guidance to ensure effective implementation of the program. HIRE II funds can be spent as CETA title I OJT programs.

However, CETA title I training opportunities are far below the employment capabilities and aspirations of the majority of the disabled and Vietnam veterans. To utilize the HIRE II program in the same manner as a CETA title I program would be a tragic disservice to veterans and the future of veterans employment initiatives. To realize the full potential of the HIRE II program, the maximum feasible effort should be made to interface HIRE II with Veterans Administration Apprenticeship, OJT, and cooperation benefits programs. To facilitate this objective, the Veterans Administration (VA) and the Veterans Employment Service (VES) must play an integral role in the development and implementation of the HIRE II training opportunities. It appears that the VA and the VES are being denied the opportunity to utilize their full potential in ensuring the success of the HIRE II program. The Department of Labor (DOL) press release announcing the appointment of Mr. Weatherford as Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary for Veterans Employment (DASVE) states that, "a number of the Department's programs helping veterans, including the HIRE program, are not under his supervision." CETA prime sponsors have the ability to implement HIRE II as a CETA title I OJT program without the assistance of the Veterans' Administration and the Veterans Employment Service. However, the programs' real potential cannot be realized without the maximum contribution and cooperation of the agencies and organizations concerned with veterans employment. Since the HIRE II program is exclusively a veterans program, the talents and resources of the DOL and the nation's veterans employment specialists must be fully utilized in order to ensure its success.

To this end it is recommended:

1. That the Veterans Employment Service and the Veterans Administration be given a major role in the technical assistance and training program to ensure that CETA prime sponsors, the Veterans Employment Service, veterans service organizations, and other organizations and individuals concerned with the development and implementation of HIRE II are full aware of its provisions and how to effectively implement them;

2. That specific goals be established for the interfacement of HIRE II with Veterans Administration OJT apprenticeship and training programs;

3. That a HIRE II orientation guide be prepared to ensure effective interpretation and implementation of the HIRE II program by all concerned; and

4. That maximum effort be made to ensure the future of the HIRE II initiative once the initial funding is expended.

To improve employment services to veterans within current fiscal and manpower resources there must be a greater emphasis on qualitative services to disabled and Vietnam veterans, rather than a quantitative increase in "compliance indicators" to all veterans. Without additional fiscal and manpower resources, any quantitative increase in the Employment Service indicator requirements would probably result in a qualitative decrease in services to many of the most needy disabled and Vietnam veterans. These veterans require the greatest individual attention in both counseling and job development. Current acquisition of employment through the employment service is often predicated upon the veteran being in the employment service office at the time the job opening is posted. Greater emphasis must be placed on counseling, skills assessment, and meaningful career development and training for disabled and Vietnam veterans. Employment Service offices must have the capability of promptly notifying veterans when an appropriate employment opportunity becomes available, and ensuring that the veteran is qualified, motivated, and prepared when referred to an employment opening. To this end it is recommended:

1. That the Disabled Veterans Outreach Program (DVOP) be continued at current strength (2000) or expanded through a combination of Federal funding and State and local CETA contributions to sustain and expand DVOP initiatives. PSE slots could be allocated by prime sponsors to local employment service offices to fund DVOPs. The role of the DVOP should be expanded to include services not only to disabled veterans, but also to Vietnam and other veterans as deemed necessary and appropriate;

2. That the counseling resources of the Veterans Administration be made available to the Employment Service to assist veterans with benefits, career planning, personal adjustment, and motivational problems, and possible cooperative outreach efforts with the VA; and

3. That greater technical assistance, training, and support be accorded to local employment service offices and DVOPs to ensure that they are fully apprised of the resources available to them and can provide necessary employment services to veterans.

In a letter dated May 4, 1978 to Congressman Lester L. Wolff (D–NY), Secretary of Labor Ray Marshall stated that the "DASVE program plan, or "Veterans Helping Veterans" program, has been carefully reviewed and a decision has been made to provide $10 million for a new veterans outreach and job development program, concentrating on target cities with high unemployment among veterans, particularly minority veterans. This program is still in the planning stage and will be announced in the near future."

The Department of Labor apparently wishes to reduce that amount to only $3 million. This amount is insufficient and represents only the funds necessary to sustain viable existing veterans outreach and supportive service programs. Many of these programs were assured that their funding would be assumed and their programs expanded by the Office of the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Veterans Employment, upon notification by Secretary Marshall and Assistant Secretary Green that a $10 million "Veterans Helping Veterans" program had been approved.

In a June 29 letter to President Carter, Rep. Margaret M. Heckler stated that "full and effective implementation of Vietnam veteran initiatives advanced by both yourself and the Congress must be supported by the Department of Labor's $10 million 'Veterans Helping Veterans' technical assistance and training programs, and by support for community-based veterans' self-help initiatives." Rep. Heckler noted that such funding will enable development of 'workable new veterans job development, outreach, supportive service, and demonstration projects."

Such a community-based effort was mandated by Section 305 of P.L. 95–93 and was an integral element of the nation's readjustment efforts for veterans of World War II. It is recommended:

1. That the "Veterans Helping Veterans" effort be funded on a case by case basis at the announced level of $10 million;

2. That maximum effort be made to allocate CETA PSE's to viable "Veterans Helping Veterans" projects to fund their staffs;

3. That a concerned technical assistance and training program be initiated as soon as possible to facilitate effective implementation of program initiatives. The success of veterans employment programs is to a far greater extent predicated upon the effective utilization, coordination, and interfacement of existing programs and resources than it is to the allocation of additional fiscal resources. One of the biggest problems facing the veteran is a lack of understanding of his needs, and how to target existing resources to address those needs; and

4. That maximum use of community-based resources, traditional service organizations, and Veterans Administration resources be utilized in the implementation of the "Veterans Helping Veterans" program.

In a letter to Secretary of Labor Ray Marshall, Congressman Wolff expressed concern that the effectiveness of the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Labor for Veterans Employment was impeded by a lack of operational control over the programs within its jurisdiction as well as the permanent professional staff resources needed to implement those programs. While the Office of the DASVE was established by Congress over 18 months ago, it still has not been allocated professional staff positions by the Civil Service Commission. Currently the Veterans Employment Service is operating with only 10 of its 15 authorized professional staff members, the vacancies occurring at critical senior policy development and implementation levels.

In a June 27 letter to Labor Secretary Ray Marshall, Rep. Heckler called for reestablishment of the position of director of the Veterans' Employment Service. She called for the appointment of a "highly qualified individual who is an aggressive veterans advocate, and one who has the confidence of the veterans community, to this important post. Mrs. Heckler noted that the abolition of the Director position has seriously affected the operation of the 200 VES personnel in the field. Rep. Heckler stated that reestablishing the position of director, and refocusing the strength of the Veterans Employment Service, would bring credibility to the operation of the VES among veterans organizations.

There appears to be an effort to curtail the statutory responsibilities of the DASVE and the Veterans Employment Service. The Department of Labor press release announcing the appointment of Acting Director of the DASVE Lawrence Weatherford states in part: "the Act specifies that the Deputy Assistant Secretary is the principal advisor to the Secretary (on) unemployment and training programs to the extent they affect veterans. A number of the Department's programs helping veterans, including the HIRE program, are not under his supervision."

The law states in fact that the DASVE "shall be the principal advisor to the Secretary of Labor with respect to the formulation and implementation of all policies and procedures . . . of the Department of Labor employment, unemployment, and training programs to the extent they affect veterans." The law further states, "to this end policies shall be promulgated and administered by a Deputy Assistant Secretary of Labor for Veterans Employment, through a Veterans Employment Service within the Department of Labor, so as to provide such veterans and persons the maximum employment and training opportunities through existing programs, coordination and merger of programs and implementation of new programs."

While the DASVE and the Veterans Employment Service should not be a separate employment and training delivery system within the Department of Labor, they must be utilized to their fullest capability to facilitate the effective formulation and implementation of programs administered by existing delivery systems to the extent they affect veterans. This working relationship can be readily established provided that the DASVE and the Veterans Employment Service are accorded their proper role within the Department of Labor. To this end it is recommended:

1. That the Civil Service Commission authorize as soon as possible permanent staff positions for the Office of DASVE, and that highly qualified persons be appointed to such positions on a temporary basis until a new DASVE is chosen;

2. That the position of Director of Veterans Employment Service be restored;

3. That qualified persons from the VES field staff be detailed on a temporary basis to the national office to ensure effective program development and implementation until the professional staff vacancies in VES can be filled permanently;

4. That the veterans employment specialists in the DASVE, VES, and the VA be utilized to their fullest extent to ensure the effective implementation of all DOL employment and training programs affecting veterans; and

5. That a technical assistance and training program be initiated to ensure effective implementation of current and new veterans employment and training program initiatives.

Legislation (H.R. 13373) has been introduced by U.S. Representatives Heckler and Wolff which would extend the 10-year delimiting period for veterans to participate in Veterans Administration OJT, apprenticeship, and cooperative programs. Enactment of this legislation is critical if the Administration initiatives are to effectively address the needs of Vietnam combat veterans. The legislation falls within the parameters of the fiscal resources available to the Veterans Affairs Committee for new initiatives.●

SENATE—Monday, July 31, 1978

(Legislative day of Wednesday, May 17, 1978)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by Hon. ROBERT C. BYRD, a Senator from the State of West Virginia.

PRAYER

The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? the Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?—Psalms 27: 1.

Almighty God, in whom we live and move and have our being, we do not know what the future holds but we know who holds the future. Thou dost hold the world and all things in it now and forever. Thou art above all men, above this Nation and all nations. In our good deeds and our misdeeds Thou art our refuge and our strength. Once more we ask Thee to enfold our little lives in the vastness of Thy love and wisdom that we may be our best selves. Show us what to do and how to do it. May we go forth into the new week in quest of the true, the beautiful, and the good, following the Lord of our salvation. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., July 31, 1978.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable ROBERT C. BYRD, a Senator from the State of West Virginia, to perform the duties of the Chair.

JAMES O. EASTLAND,

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF LEADERSHIP

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The acting Republican leader (Mr. STEVENS) is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings to date be approved.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, does the majority leader desire to use his time?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader relinquishes his time under the standing order.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield the time of the minority leader to the distinguished Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN).

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming is recognized.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON NATURAL GAS LEGISLATION

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, the proposed conference report on natural gas legislation released today is not a solution to our problems caused by regulation of natural gas; it is a continuation of these problems.

There has been only a brief time for me and my staff to review the documents, but several important items are already clear.

First. This bill will increase regulation, not end it. When it takes more than 300 pages of paper just to set forth the new control scheme, you know that simplification and freedom are not what the authors had in mind. This scheme will not only control producers, but will put all gas users at the mercy of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission's pricing powers.

Second. Enormous complexities and regulatory silliness abound in the bill. For example: If you drill 800 feet deeper from an oil well, the gas you find is not thereby new gas; but if the oil well also produces from a shallower gas horizon, then the gas you find by drilling deeper would be new gas. What is the sense in that? There is not any. There are hundreds of similar examples.

Third. Despite the vast amount of time invested in the gas question, the actual drafting of these documents was done in great haste. Matters of great importance in the statutory language were settled cursorily after staff disagreement, or left unresolved, simply to meet the time deadline imposed. All interested Senators and citizens should realize that these documents are not official unless signed by a majority of the conferees. I know that conferees will not sign the report as it stands if their careful inspection leads to the conclusion that improvements are needed.

Fourth. There are several major areas where the documents do not seem to reflect my understanding of what was agreed to based on the public record. I recognize that I do not have access to the secret legislative history of the secret meetings leading to this bill, but I would hope that these were reflected in the public discussion.

First, the conferees certainly intended that gas now flowing in intrastate markets would not be treated as controlled interstate gas. Yet, as a result of a very strained interpretation of the recent Supreme Court decision in the Southland case, the draft documents are deliberately designed to allow FERC to bring virtually all gas under the rules that are applied to controlled interstate gas.

Second, it was my understanding, following the arguments made for the original House bill, that the agreement meant that at least new gas was not subject to the regulatory burden of certification by FERC, even though it was subject to price control, and to specified nonprice regulation. This idea has been abandoned in the draft.

Third, the draft does not reflect the widely heralded message of the compromise that producers of new gas were assured a real growth rate of 3.5 percent or 4 percent per year in their ceiling price. This understanding, even though confirmed by the very analyses used by the House Members to sell the compromise, has now been abandoned.

Fourth, the agreement seemed to deregulate all gas that could be produced from new wells deeper than 15,000 feet, and new wells specifically included deeper drilling in an existing well. This too has been changed, so that a producer who wants to try for high-risk deep gas by deepening an existing well is forced instead to go out and waste money and material in drilling a whole new well from the ground down, perhaps only 50 yards away.

The economic analysis contained in the conference report correctly states (perhaps its only correct statement) that the question at issue is whether to equalize the interstate and intrastate markets by freeing the regulated or by regulating the free. This bill manages the amazing feat of taking the worst features of both.

It presents such a web of controls and regulations that, as Senator BUMPERS aptly said, it will not produce more gas than the current system, where the heavy producing areas can respond to a free market. And yet, as all analyses have shown, it will raise consumer prices above their level under the status quo.

How did this disaster come about? The House and Senate each passed a bill that, in their different ways, represented a coherent philosophy, and a considerable period of careful thought. The draft, as produced, represents nothing but a fevered attempt to find a ground on which 51 percent of the conferees can stand, so that the President can say that he has passed an energy plan. The details of this bill have been taken as set in concrete based on hurried conferences and last-minute agreements. This is no way to legislate. We should not throw away our energy future, for at least the next 7 years, just to give a President, a Senator, or a Representative campaign ammunition. I think we should turn off this summer rerun, and produce a bill early in the new Congress that will unleash the productive genius in the American people.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DECONCINI). Under the previous order, the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senator from Wyoming. The Senate and the Nation owe much to the work that he has performed in the field of energy over the years, and this clear statement of his merits the consideration of the entire country. I commend him for it.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mary Gore of Senator STEVENS' staff be permitted access to the floor today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 3355—LET THE PEOPLE HAVE THEIR SAY

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I rise to speak about the economy of our country. In years gone by, our attention has been directed to the threat of inflation. We are no longer dealing with threats. Inflation is here.

Practically all prices have skyrocketed. The cost of acquiring a home is now prohibitive for many people. It was said recently that the day will soon come when a modest home will cost $600,000, while the average wage will then amount to $250,000 a year. If that comes to pass, everyone who is toiling now and buying life insurance, investing in savings, and paying social security tax at the present wage base will face disaster.

Mr. President, I flatly deny that I am a prophet of gloom and doom. I believe that there is still time to rescue our economy. I believe that the American people are more intelligent and more concerned about the future of our economy than most people in the political world. I believe that if the American people are given the facts, they will muster the courage and the self-discipline necessary to see to it that the finances of our Federal Government are placed in order. I think it is of great importance that we find out just what the people think about the financial practices of our Federal Government.

The high cost of living, our runaway inflation, and the devaluation of the dollar all represent the same problem. High prices are but a symptom. We must look to the root cause. Our economy is complex and I do not propose to offer an all-inclusive diagnosis of our ills. There are, however, some very important and principal causes of our economic woes. The first is the ruinous and wasteful spending of the Federal Government which results in continued deficits, high taxes, a mounting national debt, and the very damaging inflation that presently exists. The other cause which must be mentioned is our trade policy. For instance, we buy billions of dollars of goods from Japan. But Japan, in turn, imports many billions of dollars less from us. This means that Japan soon has an excess supply of U.S. dollars, which subsequently become less valuable in Japan and elsewhere.

In 1960, about one American out of three made his living in manufacturing. Today, only about one American out of four can find a job in manufacturing. But, it is not my purpose today to talk about trade. I wish to talk about the larger of the two problems, the finances of the U.S. Government.

Spending is at an all-time high. According to the Congressional Budget Office, spending in this fiscal year will reach the total sum of $452 billion and the tax revenues will only amount to $401 billion. This leaves a deficit that is unpaid. We are going into debt by that amount. We are leaving the consequences for tomorrow and for our children's tomorrow.

The deficit now being incurred by the Federal Government is not a one-time deficit due to some disaster. It is the established pattern of the Congress of the United States. This pattern has been followed for almost a half-century with but occasional bright spots. It is true that deficits in the past were not nearly as large as those of today, but the seeds were then planted for our present crisis.

The problem is a difficult one. It cannot be fully met by a more efficient operation of government and the elimination of waste, even though these things are of great importance. If we are to save our country financially, we will have to decide how much government we can afford. We must take the case to the people and let them decide. If the people are allowed to speak and the Congress of the United States takes their advice, all the pessimism that haunts me concerning the future will disappear and I will once more revert to my natural state of enthusiastic optimism.

Mr. President, I am introducing a bill today that calls for an advisory referendum with respect to a balanced budget. It is my hope that this bill could be promptly enacted and that every State in the Union will participate in this referendum.

This proposal calls for placing on the ballot in every State a referendum, to be voted upon in the general election to be held in November 1978. This will give the voters a chance to express themselves on Federal spending. It will give the people an opportunity to give guidance to the Congress and to the President as to the financial policy we should follow. The people should decide whether or not our Government should continue its long-established practice of deficit spending or start now to reduce expenditures and bring the budget in balance in a short period, such as 2 years. The ballot will inform the voter that he is asked to express an opinion on our spending policies and the voter will be instructed to vote for one of the two following alternatives:

First. That a start be made at once to reduce Federal spending, and that a balanced budget be reached within a period of the next two fiscal years; or Second. The Federal Government should continue its present practice of deficit financing.

The States will be called upon to tabulate and certify the results by State and congressional district and transmit the same to the President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the President of the Senate.

The voter will be informed right on the ballot that is used that the results of the polling are advisory only and shall have no legal effect.

If this is done, it will have a great moral and political effect on the country and on the Congress. The people are sovereign and if they wish to speak they will exercise that sovereignty. I have great confidence that they will direct a course that is sound and best for our country.

This bill provides that there shall be paid to each State, for the purpose of doing this, the sum of 1 cent multiplied by the number of voters who cast votes in the general election in November 1976.

Mr. President, the question may be raised: Why do I propose that the voters have a chance to choose between an immediate start of spending retrenchment with a balanced budget to be obtained within 2 years, or the continuation of the present deficit financing, and not give them a chance to vote on a balanced budget to be obtained a few years further down the road? My answer to that is that such plans for balancing the budget several years down the road always fail—they never work. They must be cast in the category of broken political promises.

Mr. President, I hope that this proposal will have immediate and favorable action by the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Delaware (Mr. ROTH), I send a bill to the desk for appropriate reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be received and appropriately referred.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I yield the floor and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. HUMPHREY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the Senator from Tennessee, the minority leader, be transferred to me. I understand that this has been cleared on the minority side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HUMAN RIGHTS ESSAY REMINDS US OF THE NEED TO RATIFY THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Madam President, I recently received a letter from Archbishop Iakovos of the Greek Orthodox Church of North and South America. He enclosed an essay entitled "Human Rights," by Prof. Constantine Tsatsos, a Greek legal scholar and philosopher. In his treatise, Professor Tsatsos critically explores several philosophical questions concerning human rights. He begins his essay with a definition of human rights. I quote:

> All rights are validated that guarantee the individual a sphere of free action for the cultivation of his creative powers . . . And all must have the possibility of creative activity; the activity of one may not impinge on that of another.

Professor Tsatsos further explains why human rights are vital and why they must be protected vigorously. Again, I quote:

> Man's destiny (is) to create the material, civilization, (and) rights exist to that general end.

Underlying Professor Tsatsos' discussion is a right of which I have often spoken on this floor—the right to live. How can individuals think or act creatively if they fear for their lives? If people know that they may be killed merely because of their race, ethnic origin, nationality, political, or religious beliefs. How can we expect them to contribute positively to civilization? The right to live is fundamental, and the foundation upon which every other right is built.

Madam President, we must defend and protect the right to live. Professor Tsatsos' essay eloquently reinforces how imperative our active advocacy of human rights is, particularly the right to live.

This Senate can and should act to help to guarantee the right to live. We must ratify the United Nations Genocide Convention. Eighty-three nations have acceded to the treaty, and every President since Truman has favored its ratification. Daily we are reminded of atrocities that threaten the lives of thousands of people, and as Professor Tsatsos reminds us, the violation of human rights threatens to undermine our entire civilization.

Madam President, I urge the Senate to ratify this crucial human rights convention.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, I wish to comment again on the indefatigable, extraordinary and exemplary work which Senator PROXMIRE does daily with respect to the genocide treaty, I am full of admiration.

I deeply believe that, as time goes on and we see more Ugandas and Cambodias and other comparable tragedies, we will succeed.

I am very thankful that Senator PROXMIRE, almost singlehandedly, keeps this vital, human, and world issue alive. I am very grateful to him.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Madam President, I thank my good friend from New York.

I have spoken many times over the last 11 years with respect to this treaty on the floor of the Senate; but I think that the distinguished Senator from New York, with his very strong and consistent and always very intelligent advocacy of the genocide treaty in the Foreign Relations Committee, represents by far the best hope of getting this treaty ratified.

I recognize it is going to be very difficult to get a treaty like this, as it is controversial, and it is likely to tie up the Senate, enacted this year, although I am hopeful we can move forward on it.

I plead to the leadership at the very least to put it first on the agenda and give it top priority next year when, of course, there will not be the same problems that we have at the present time so that we can at long last join the other nations of the world, the overwhelming majority of the nations, virtually all of our allies in the world, all of the free nations and many of the Communist nations which have done this.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. JAVITS. My recollection is that a treaty that is reported out survives the end of a Congress. That is my recollection.

I will discuss with the Foreign Relations Committee, and I will make it my business to get it on the agenda again, the possibility of reporting it out so that in those so-called dog days of the new Congress, when we are organizing, et cetera, that time may be taken without harm to some other major national issue which may be also of high priority but which we could not get to anyhow in January or February, and I might say to the Senator that I believe the great majority of the Foreign Relations Committee is ready again to report out the Genocide Treaty. But I think the leadership, ever since Mike Mansfield's day here, has felt that we simply have to produce the votes for cloture at the same time that we report out the treaty, but it may very well be that with this time lag we are talking about and if we could get the President, and I will personally appeal to the President, to give really high priority and strong backing, we may be able to get the leadership to defer the proof of the votes being there until next year because there will be a good many new Senators, and so on, and at least by reporting out the stage will be set for action in those days when Congress is being organized, et cetera.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Madam President, this is very encouraging. I think the time has come now, and we have said this before, but I do think the situation is different. The dramatic effect of that TV series "Holocaust" which demonstrated, as has no dramatic action that I can recall, the viciousness of genocide, the fact that genocide is continuing in Cambodia, Uganda, elsewhere in the world, and the initiative the President of the United States is now taking to make human rights the centerpiece of his foreign relations policy, all these should contribute, plus the fact that the American Bar Association no longer opposes the genocide treaty and now favors it. I think these are the elements that should enable us to pass this treaty, I hope overwhelmingly, next year.

Mr. JAVITS. I will join with the Senator and I think with others to see if we can work that out.

I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator.

Madam President, I understand under the arrangements that have been made it is proper for me to yield back the time of the minority leader at this time so that action can commence on the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1978

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of S. 2152, which the clerk will state by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2152) to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act to authorize the United States to participate in the supplementary financing facility of the International Monetary Fund.

The Senate resumed consideration of S. 2152.

Mr. SARBANES. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second asistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SARBANES. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SARBANES. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that Karin Lissakers and Janice O'Connell, of the Foreign Relations Committee staff, and Cliff Hackett, of my staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor throughout the consideration of this legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 3390

(Purpose: To amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act)

Mr. ABOUREZK. Madam President, I call up amendment No. 3390 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), for himself, Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD, Mr. BAYH, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. MCGOVERN, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. WEICKER, and Mr. LEAHY, proposes amendment numbered 3390:

SEC. 3. The Bretton Woods Agreement Act, as amended by sections 1 and 2 of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"SEC. 29. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury shall instruct the United States Executive Director on the Executive Board of the International Monetary Fund to initiate a wide consultation with the Managing Director of the Fund and other member country Executive Directors with regard to encouraging the staff of the Fund to formulate stabilization programs entered into pursuant to loans from the Supplementary Financing Facility which, to the maximum feasible extent, foster a broader base of productive investment and employment, especially in those productive activities which are designed to meet basic human needs.

"(b) In accordance with the unique character of the Fund, the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct the United States Executive Director to take all possible steps to the end that all Supplementary Financing Facility transactions, including economic programs developed in connection with the utilization of Fund resources, do not contribute to the deprivation of basic human needs, nor to the violation of basic human rights, such as torture, cruel or inhumane treatment or degrading punishment, prolonged detention without charge, or other flagrant denials of life, liberty, and the security of person; and to oppose all such transactions which would contribute to such deprivations or violations.

"(c) In order to gain a better understanding of the social, political, and economic impact of the Fund's stabilization programs entered into pursuant to loans from the Fund's Supplementary Financing Facility on borrowing countries, especially as it relates to the poor majority within those countries, the United States Governor of the Fund shall prepare and submit, not later than one hundred and eighty days after the close of each calendar year, a report to the Congress. Such report shall evaluate, with respect to countries to which loans are made by the Supplementary Financing Facility during each year, the effects of policies of those countries which result from the standby agreement(s) on the ability of the poor in such countries to obtain:

"(1) an adequate supply of food with sufficient nutritional value to avoid the debilitating effects of malnutrition;

"(2) shelter and clothing;

"(3) public services, including health care, education, clean water, energy resources, and transportation; and

"(4) productive employment that provides a reasonable and adequate wage.".

Mr. ABOUREZK. Madam President, parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Is there a time agreement on this amendment or others on this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, there is not.

Mr. ABOUREZK. A further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ABOUREZK. The order is that there shall not be a vote before 3 o'clock today. Would there be time, with the consent of the managers of the bill, for additional supplementary debate when there are more people on the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order provides that there will be no votes prior to 3 o'clock, no roll call votes.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Are there other votes backed up or will there be other votes backed up at 3 o'clock or will this be the only vote at 3 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That remains to be seen.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, will the Senator yield to me? The understanding is only that no votes will occur before 3 o'clock, which means that if Members talk they might talk until 6 or 7 or 8 or 9, so that many Senators will be here, if that is what the Senator is waiting for, except that we do not vote until we stop talking unless there is a motion to table, and even a motion to table will not be made, I would advise the Senator by this particular manager, until 3 o'clock. Thereafter it is open season. But certainly I would not wish to foreclose a modest amount of debate for a little while after 3.

According to our schedule there will be—the general attendance will come in beginning at about 1 or 1:30, so that 3 o'clock is kind of an arbitrary period because, according to our schedule, most Members who are not here will arrive between 1 and 2 o'clock this afternoon. A relatively few will come after 4, so we may not have to wait for them. On my list there are one or two who come in at that time. I do not know about the Democratic list. The Senator, I am sure, can get that. So I think the opportunity for debate with the presence of Senators will be very ample, and it is entirely within the control of the Members and also of the managers in terms of tabling, and I have already given the Senator from my side my assurance on that score.

Mr. ABOUREZK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JAVITS. I have the list here. It is a fact that we have only one Member who will not be here until 4:30.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Madam President, this amendment has bipartisan support. If I may, I would like to read the cosponsors. In addition to myself they are Senators MARK O. HATFIELD, BAYH, RIEGLE, MCGOVERN, ANDERSON, PROXMIRE, WEICKER, and LEAHY. In addition it has support from people who are not cosponsors on both sides of the aisle.

This amendment calls for the U.S. delegate to the Fund to take steps to insure that a Fund's transaction does not contribute to the deprivation of the basic human rights and needs of the citizens of a borrowing country and to oppose such loans which would contribute to these deprivations.

All too often, the economic hardships associated with IMF-related reforms are concentrated among the poorest people in the borrowing countries. Several recent examples have shown that social programs, such as food subsidies, are the first to be eliminated or reduced. While it is recognized that certain international economic reforms are necessary to counteract short-term balance-of-payment difficulties, this amendment would help insure that the burden of these reforms is shared equitably by the citizens of a borrowing country.

Peru is a country which was forced to accept IMF-imposed conditions in order to qualify for a badly needed loan. The conditions which prejudicially affected the poor people precipitated riots and strikes, resulting in the imposition of martial law and the suspension of constitutional rights. An article in the Washington Post in February on Portugal's economic status states that—

> The IMF is insisting on what sober, conservative people regard as draconian measures. Portugal's fear that if such harsh terms are accepted in steeper credit cuts and sky-high interest rates, hundreds of small companies will go bust and the number of jobless—most of them unprotected by employment benefits, will reach even more drastic totals.

The arguments for this amendment are compelling, not only because of the recent hardships suffered by Peru, Egypt, and now Jamaica as a result of IMF-imposed policies, but because it is time we stopped the erosion of congressional control over our foreign aid programs and their policies. This amendment provides a legitimate exercise in congressional authority. In fiscal year 1976, the Congress authorized only 31 percent of total U.S.-related, Third World aid or about $8 billion out of a total of $25 billion. Bilateral foreign aid programs have been brought under closer congressional supervision, but by contrast, the institutions like the IMF have more than doubled their spending since 1971 with little congressional scrutiny.

This amendment does not impede the Fund's freedom to foster long-term economic development and growth. It simply asks the U.S. Executive Director to the Witteveen Facility to appropriately integrate short- and long-term goals while considering social and political consequences. I hope the Senate will join me in supporting this amendment to the Witteveen Facility.

Mr. President, I have received a letter from the Maryknoll Fathers who do social work in Peru. They are based in Lima, and work with the poor people in Peru. The letter is dated June 23, 1978, and it is addressed to me, and is as follows:

PADRES DE MARYKNOLL.
Lima, Peru, June 23, 1978.

Hon. JAMES ABOUREZK,
New Senate Office Building,

DEAR SENATOR ABOUREZK: As U.S. citizens and missioners serving the people in Peru, we follow with great interest and concern the Human Rights Policy practiced by the current administration. It is our judgment that the policy has been consistent in favor of civil political rights, while ignoring social-economic rights.

We are deeply concerned with this policy. Its area of pressure for the civil-political rights is good and we support it completely. However, its lack of balance, in falling to recognize the most fundamental human rights for food, clothing and shelter is seriously negating and in fact destructive for the people of our under-developed nations.

We as missionaries here in Peru accompany our people on a day to day basis and have seen the results of what we consider this unbalanced policy: The poor (85 percent of the people) have moved from malnutrition to the border of starvation while being given the right to vote in the midst of repression. In other words, the vote is more important than bread. We must register our strong disagreement with this policy and its effects on the poor we serve.

We write to you, Mr. Abourezk, because to a great extent the IMF is responsible for this situation. It has made demands on this Nation which are humanly impossible to meet. What nation can pay out 60 percent of its export earnings in one year simply to pay its debts? This policy has resulted in all food subsidies being taken away, real wages dropping over 40 percent in three years, and in 100 times more deaths (through disease and deprivation) than could be caused through riots or repression.

We are aware, Mr. Abourezk, that your Human Rights amendment to the Witteveen Facility is being faced with a stiff challenge in the Senate and that the administration would prefer that it not pass. Our position on your amendment is that of strong support.

We are strongly in favor of civil rights, but we consider them as valid only within the context of the full human rights that guarantee the basic necessities of life and allow the poor to live with some sense of personal human dignity.

We sincerely applaud your initiative, Senator, and will do all that is possible to support its passage.

Peace,

P.S. We send you this letter with haste as North American Religious Superiors in Peru. A copy signed by North American missionary personnel will follow.

It is signed by a number of priests, who are the Maryknoll priests, who work in Peru with the poor people.

In addition to that, Mr. President, I choose not to read at this point but to ask unanimous consent that there be inserted in the RECORD a series of newspaper articles which report similar kinds of deprivations as a result of IMF-imposed policies.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star, Feb. 12, 1978]

BAILING OUT BANKS THAT STRAITJACKET THE THIRD WORLD BANKS

(By Howard M. Wachtel and Michael Moffitt)

The catchword of foreign policy pronouncements from the State Department is human rights. But across town, the Treasury doesn't seem to have gotten the word. Their international economic policy has had the effect of restricting human rights by imposing conditions of economic austerity on countries that are in debt.

This has happened in Peru, Zaire, Jamaica, and in wealthier countries too, like Portugal, Turkey, and Italy.

The Peruvian case is particularly instructive because after 1968 a progressive government had embarked on an ambitious program of social development and democratization of the workplace only to have the reforms aborted by the conditions that the International Monetary Fund and, later, private bankers imposed on Peru.

Business Week has implored bankers to be cautious of these types of ventures because they raise "troublesome questions about foreign business interference in the affairs of a sovereign state." The banks insist that "they did not interfere in Peru's affairs," but "simply told Peru to put its financial house in order and the Peruvian authorities independently decided how they would make themselves credit-worthy again."

The survival of Egyptian President Sadat has also been threatened by debt and the conditions creditors have imposed. Less than a year ago, the New York Times editorialized that "Egyptian crowds rioted when the subsidies for food and fuel were removed . . . That action, threatening the regime of President Sadat, was imposed by Egypt's creditors." The U.S. Treasury in a more subdued tone, echoes the same theme. "Whichever adjustment policies a government chooses," the Treasury remarked in a report on debt, "it may face political difficulties in implementing them. Restraining current consumption may require adoption of an incomes policy that angers wage earners."

To understand the origins of this austerity question we must go back to the early 1970s, when New York-based multinational banks engaged in a worldwide expansion of finance that was without precedent in history. Billions of petrodollars—dollar earnings of OPEC countries—flowed into U.S.-based multinational banks at a speed that rivaled the rate at which the oil gushed from the sands of the Middle East. The petrodollars have been recycled through the financial system by a handful of private U.S. multinational banks who have accepted OPEC's deposits, and, in turn, loaned them out to borrowers experiencing balance-of-payments problems. And like true financial nomads, the modern multinational bankers have roamed the earth setting up their financial tents wherever they promised to yield the most profits with the least government regulation.

Offshore banking havens sprouted in places like the Cayman Islands, the Bahamas, Panama, and Singapore. In the Bahamas, there is now one bank for every 800 inhabitants. New York's Citibank, one of the largest multinational banks in the world, is reported to have booked 20 per cent of its offshore loans from offices in the Bahamas and now receives 20 per cent of its earnings from oil-importing less-developed countries.

Increasingly, the loans made by these private multinational banks have not gone to their typical blue-chip private corporate customers. Instead, many loans have been made to governments of less-developed countries in the Third World, whose debt has reached crisis proportions in the past five years. The 86 LDCs that import oil and other necessities have accumulated a debt of $200 billion; all but $83 billion has been borrowed since 1972. Of this total debt, about $80 billion is owed to private banks.

This burden of debt is overwhelming for the many poor countries who find themselves substantially in hock to their creditors, their futures mortgaged to the bill-collector. Countries like Pakistan, Botswana, Somalia, the Congo and others have debts nearly as large as their gross national product. The debt is so onerous that larger and larger proportions of precious export earnings must be used to pay back old debts. Egypt, Mexico, Brazil, Peru, and Pakistan are now using anywhere from 30 to 40 per cent of their annual export earnings to pay off old debts.

Whether or not these loans can ever be paid back is a question which has stirred great controversy in policy-making circles. On the one hand, bankers publicly insist that their capital structures are sound and that they have not, as some have alleged, become seriously "overexposed" in a number of Third World countries. Among those whose concern has been aroused by the dramatic growth of private bank loans to the Third World are such figures as Arthur Burns, former chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, and IMF Director H. Johannes Witteveen. In a speech last year at Columbia University, Burns warned that the international financial system is seriously overextended and "especially vulnerable" to a possible crisis should there be another international recession.

The situation cries out for much more disclosure of the financial situation of the banks so that the public can make a rational decision about the several expensive proposals now floating around to resolve the world's current debt predicament.

One proposal now making its way through Congress would cost the American taxpayer $1.7 billion—the U.S. contribution to a $10 billion fund put together by the IMF to assist countries that are in debt. The name given to this fund is the Witteveen Facility, named after the IMF official, of the Netherlands. The stated purpose of the Witteveen Facility is to provide loans to countries that are experiencing serious debt problems. At first glance, this seems to be an innocuous, though expensive, activity; but beneath the surface lurk important questions for the American taxpayer who will foot this bill and for the countries that will borrow money from the Witteveen Facility:

How will IMB member countries benefit from the Witteveen Facility?

Will the Witteveen Facility become an indirect subsidy to private U.S. multinational banks who have lent enormous sums of money to the less-developed-countries (LDCs) and fear that these loans can never be repaid?

Will funds expanded under the Witteveen Facility help meet the basic human needs of the poor in the world in concert with the development strategies being discussed in the World Bank and the U.S. Agency for International Development?

Are the conditions of economic austerity imposed by the IMF compatible with the human rights thrust of the Carter administration?

Just like New York City, debtor countries are under pressure to mortgage their political sovereignty (to use former Mayor Beame's characterization) to their creditors by adopting austerity programs imposed by the private foreign banks or in conjunction with the IMF. Arthur Burns has referred to this as the "IMF certificate of good standing," designed to restore bankers' perceptions of credit-worthiness of an impoverished nation.

Whatever the coating, the austerity pill usually prescribed by the IMF and private banks adds up to the same medicine: lowering the standard of living through a dose of restrictive fiscal and monetary policies whose effect is to increase unemployment, restrict the activities of labor unions, and reduce public sector expenditures on the very basic human needs that the World Bank and the United States propose as the cornerstone for their development policies in the world.

All this adds up to a series of contradictory forces operating on U.S. foreign policy. The commercial banks who lent money to poor countries naturally expect to have those loans repaid. However, in the course of paying back the debt, the poor countries are being asked to dance to a particular tune of the piper, a melody that imposes conditions of economic austerity which restricts a country's ability to fulfill the basic human needs strategy that World Bank President Robert McNamara and President Carter have articulated as the goal of development assistance. At times countries are pushed into policies that necessarily restrict human rights in order to enforce a policy of lowering the standard of living of their people.

The austerity route, however, is not the only policy that would assist debt repayment. Other options are open, options that would enable countries to pay back their loans, expand human rights, and meet basic needs.

First, poor countries could be encouraged to diversify their exports so they can reduce their dependence on the export of one crop or one mineral. The industrial countries could also reduce their import barriers on finished manufactured goods and processed raw materials from the LDCs. Less-developed countries with higher and more stable export earnings would be much better customers for U.S. exports.

Secondly, LDCs could be more selective in the type of imports they allow in under the conditions for the extension of future credits. Rather than restrict necessities like food, a country could restrict the importation of luxury goods, as the Manley government of Jamaica has done.

Finally, the industrial countries could follow the Swedish government's example of writing off the debts owed to them by poor countries. As the debate about a foreign aid reorganization bill is heating up in Congress, we should consider debt write-off as a significant foreign aid option. We would get more bang for the buck this way since fewer bureaucrats would be needed to administer debt relief than for the normal aid program.

None of these alternative solutions has been discussed by the Congress as it has deliberated about the Witteveen Facility. Rep. Cavanaugh, D-Neb., a member of the House Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee, which has jurisdiction over the bill, complained that adequate public discussion of these issues has never been held.

These pleas have thus far fallen on deaf ears and on January 23, the House Banking, Finance, and Urban Affairs Committee approved the U.S. contribution to the Witteveen Facility. By a margin of two votes, an amendment by Congressman Mitchell, D-Md., was defeated that would have "encouraged" the IMF staff to develop stabilization programs for countries that meet basic human needs and do not restrict human rights.

There is little debate about the necessity for some international mechanism for bailing out the countries heavily in debt to private U.S. multinational banks and public lending institutions. The issue is the form this facility will take and the conditions it will impose on sovereign countries. However, like the two sides of a coin, the creditor countries stand to benefit from the Witteveen Facility just as much as the debtor countries. Congressman Pattison, D-N.Y., addressed this question with an amendment, also defeated, that would have prevented the Witteveen Facility from simply becoming a mechanism for bailing out the private banks through an indirect IMF-administered subsidy, while thrusting the risk of default wholly onto public lending institutions. If, as most bankers maintain, the private banking system is currently sound, then why do we need the Witteveen Facility to bolster confidence in the financial system?

In opposing the Witteveen Facility, the Wall Street Journal editorialized that "American taxpayers, in other words, will be asked to cough up a few billion for the IMF to loan to the poor countries so that they can pay off the banks . . . Imagine the flap if the problem were solved honestly and directly," they ask. by calling the Witteveen Facility "The Bankers Relief Act of 1977."

BANKS LIKE LENDING TO THE THIRD WORLD—WITH IMF AID

(By Roger Smith)

The near bankruptcy of Peru and Zaire two years ago underscored a startling development. U.S. commercial banks had rapidly accelerated lending to underdeveloped countries, and were faced with defaults that could shake the world banking system.

This spring Peru and Zaire are again reeling toward insolvency. But now the U.S. banks are almost sanguine. Despite over $45 billion in unguaranteed loans to less developed countries (LDCs) that do not export oil, U.S. bankers say they are confident that their profits in those nations are secure.

There are two reasons. Many bankers contend that LDC governments now realize how important their relations with banks are, and are giving top priority to servicing their bank debt. And international organizations such as the International Monetary Fund are increasingly shouldering the burden where defaults are likely, in effect running interference for the private banks.

The result defuses the potential for massive defaults which theoretically could have toppled some major banks. But the controversy over heavy involvement by U.S. banks in Third World finances continues, centering not only on whether it is good business but whether it is good foreign policy.

The loans—most of them made on a short-term basis to help the developing countries meet balance of payment deficits or to finance trade with industrialized countries—required rapid growth in exports from the developing countries to assure eventual repayment. But the world economy is faced with slow growth in the near term, reducing the prospect for increases in LDC exports.

If the loans have to be rescheduled or refinanced, the banks require the debtor nation to adhere to stringent IMF conditions aimed at helping to stabilize the nation's balance of payments or current account.

This can result in drastically curtailed employment, income and consumption in the affected country. "The politics of stabilization are not always genteel," notes Albert Fishlow, a professor of economics at Yale University writing in the spring issue of Foreign Policy. In the case of Peru, dramatic hikes in food and gasoline prices precipitated riots and talk of revolution.

The banks began major lending to developing countries in the late 1960s and plunged even deeper to help LDCs meet a quadrupling of oil prices in 1973. When recession dried up loan demand in the United States in 1975, the banks pumped out more credit to LDCs. Total indebtedness of the developing countries that do not have any significant oil exports is estimated at roughly $250 billion, of which U.S. banks hold 20 percent.

Bankers vigorously defend their commitments. "There are risks in lending to these countries, but they are manageable risks," says A. C. Rice, vice chairman of Bank of America, which has $6.2 billion in outstanding loans to LDCs.

The banks typically run "country risk" studies before agreeing to loans in a developing country. The effectiveness of such studies is disputed, but Bank of America, among other banks, claims that such examinations help safeguard their investments.

The banks also cling to short term, high interest loans to LDCs, thus limiting their exposure to tight time frames. "Moreover, the bulk of these loans is from major international banks with the greatest experience in overseas lending and the strongest capital and reserve positions," says G. A. Costanzo, vice chairman of Citibank, New York.

Citibank is the most active lender to LDCs among U.S. banks, with $11.3 billion outstanding. By loaning mostly to higher income developing countries at high interest rates, Citibank contends that it can make higher profits than by concentrating on domestic loans. In fact, the bank made more money in Brazil last year than from all its domestic lending.

"We will continue to seek out such loans," says Citibank Chairman Walter Wriston. "There are 4 billion people out there and only 200 million at home."

Bankers also note that loans to LDCs represent only about 5 percent of total outstanding U.S. bank lending, and that the record on loan losses to LDC's continues to compare favorably to domestic loan losses.

But critics of the deepening bank involvement in the Third World argue that the losses are bound to increase as the debt burden on LDCs becomes more difficult to manage. And the banks are depending on the IMF or even the U.S. government to prop up shaky LDC regimes, they charge. The examples of Peru and Zaire, which most U.S. bankers contend are isolated cases, could become harbingers of the future, the critics say.

Zaire, formerly the Belgian Congo, is heavily dependent on its copper mines in Shaba province for export revenue. An invasion by Katangese rebels two years ago nearly halted production before Zairian troops regained control. A similar invasion this year has knocked out the mines for six months or more, putting debt-ridden Zaire close to bankruptcy.

At stake are $252 million in U.S. bank loans. Citibank, the leading Zairian creditor, and a consortium of U.S. banks have put together a new $215 million loan package to Zaire to insure that current debt payments are met. But Zaire may be so short of cash that the Citibank rescue effort will prove futile.

Peru flirted with bankruptcy in 1976 when its balance of payments fell $1.3 billion into the red, and appeared unable to meet an immediate repayment of $300 million on its $3.7 billion foreign debt. Citibank again led a group of banks to the rescue, offering a $300 million loan in two installments.

Now Peru has come dangerously close to missing another series of payments, in part because the military government has spent lavishly on warships and bombers. At stake are $1.8 billion in U.S. bank loans.

In both cases U.S. and major foreign banks are counting on the International Monetary Fund to engender a solution to save their positions. The IMF, created by the United Nations, can extend short term emergency credit to nations faced with crucial balance of payments problems. But in return, the nation must adhere to strict economic controls formulated by the IMF.

In the case of Peru, the IMF has already imposed severe controls. In Zaire, the IMF is planning to place its representative in a key position in the central bank, assuring a firm grip on the country's finances by the international agency.

"Both banks and international officials have the same general view on how a country should be managed," says J. Alexander Caldwell, chief international economist at Crocker Bank. "In Peru they just didn't face up to realities and somebody has got to bite the bullet."

The standby credits issued by the IMF to imperiled nations enable the banks to keep their loans alive. But both Peru and Zaire clearly face enormous hardships in the months ahead which could lead to internal unrest and even more problems for the U.S. State Department.

It is likely that U.S. banks will not lend proportionally as much to LDCs in the next few years. Domestic loan opportunities are improving, and the expected slowdown in world trade would increase the risks of overseas loans.

But U.S. banking had developed a substantial stake overseas," notes Caldwell, and over the long term U.S. bank lending seems bound to increase. A default here or there will not deter the banks, nor will it seriously damage a well managed bank, says Robert Solomon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution.

Nevertheless, international authorities are hedging their bets. The IMF is pushing for $10 billion in additional standby credit authority. And some economists are proposing that the World Bank, which concentrates on long term financing for development projects, join with the IMF in backing some critical loans to LDCs.

ZAIRE ACCEDES KEY ECONOMIC ROLE TO FOREIGNERS

(By Michael Getler)

BRUSSELS.—Zaire's virtually bankrupt government yesterday offered to accept broad foreign control of its economy in an effort to solve crippling financial problems aggravated by the invasion of Shaba Province.

Under the African nation's proposals, according to conference participants, an official from the International Monetary Fund would take a key role in managing Zaire's central bank and another foreign official would supervise all outlays by the Finance Ministry.

The plan was presented at the start of a two-day meeting between Zairian officials and representatives of 10 creditor nations and three international bodies. Together, they exercise a crucial influence on the survival of President Mobutu Sese Seko's government.

While the meeting was scheduled before the invasion by Katangan rebels a month ago, the overriding issue was whether Mobutu's government, and Western investments in the huge country, can be protected time and again from determined attackers—who President Carter has maintained are Cuban-trained.

The creditor nations show little sympathy for Mobutu yet seem to be forced to save him to keep Zaire in the Western camp and capable of paying its debts.

This mood of political frustration lends an air of unreality to the meetings, which is supposed to concentrate solely on financial issues affecting the potentially rich mineral-exporting nation.

Lack of discipline in Zaire's central bank and inefficiency and corruption within the government have been major factors for the past few years in Western reluctance to extend still more credit and aid to a country whose debt is already said to total about $2.5 billion.

The so-called "Mobutu Plan," and Zaire's economic woes, both go back some two years and are due in part to the sharp decline in world copper prices. Copper provides about 70 percent of Zaire's export revenues, with cobalt the second major mineral export.

The situation neared the brink of economic catastrophe following the invasion of mineral-rich Shaba Province by rebels based in Angola. The attack, although eventually diven off by French paratroopers, has shut down the mines for at least six months and driven away or left dead many of the Europeans who operate the mines.

The meeting here is not designed to make decisions on what to do about the economic plight but rather to hear the revised Zaire plan and achieve some sore of consensus about what can be recommended to the governments of the United States, Britain, Belgium, France, West Germany, the Netherlands, Italy, Japan, Canada and Iran, as well as IMF, World Bank, and the executive committee of the European Common Market.

The officials meeting here are trying to agree on recommendations for an initial $100 million to $120 million emergency aid program of food, medicine and humanitarian supplies over the next three months that was agreed in principle at a five-power meeting in Paris earlier this month.

The Mobutu plan, however, could eventually cost a few billion dollars.

Although the plan was not made public, Belgian officials said their former colony indicated its long-term investment needs through 1980 amount to about $1 billion. Whether this would come from governmental or private sectors is now being discussed.

Zaire, according to Belgian officials, already has unmet debt repayments projected at $2.2 billion between 1977 and 1980. Some 40 percent of this is owed to private creditors.

In addition to the investment program, additional aid would be needed from international organizations.

The key factor in whether the plan gains widespread support, however, is said to hinge upon the IMF granting new credits to Zaire. In 1976–77 the IMF granted special standby credits totalling some $273 million.

The Mobutu plan is said to propose major efforts to get the shattered mining industry back into production, attract foreign investors, revamp the public service, improve customs and import licensing services and democratize the country.

Zaire has always had many Europeans in key advisory posts—especially Belgians, who have some $6 billion invested there. But the new plan envisions bringing in many others.

The arrival of these foreign experts, Zairian delegate Bokana W'Ondangela said, "doesn't mean we are coming back to colonialism—but simply into international cooperation. We are turning to our friends and to international organizations for assistance."

U.S. HELPED VORSTER GET LOANS FROM IMF

(By John M. Goshko)

Despite its official criticism of South Africa's racial policies, the United States has helped Prime Minister John Vorster obtain $163 million from the International Monetary Fund to combat his country's economic problems.

Rooted in that action is a case study of the contradictory choices confronting U.S. officials who must work out a design for furthering U.S. interests and policy objectives on a global basis.

Specifically, U.S. support of South Africa in the IMF raises questions about whether there is a built-in clash between the political and economic goals of Washington's foreign policy.

On one side, there is the concern of the United States, which played the leading role in creating international lending agencies like the IMF, that the integrity and impartiality of these institutions be protected so they can perform the jobs for which they were designed.

In the case of the IMF, that job is to help 130 member countries overcome threats to their economies caused by adverse trade balances—imports outstripping exports—that seriously deplete gold and currency reserves.

The success of the IMF's bail-out operations, U.S. officials note, is important to every country engaged in international trade. If a country, particularly a large country like South Africa, runs into balance-of-payments problems that make it unable to sell products and pay its foreign debts, the resulting chain reactions could disrupt international trade and monetary systems.

For that reason, officials say, the United States must treat loans made by the IMF differently than U.S. aid granted on a direct, government-to-government basis.

Washington, they argue, must set an example for other mebers by ensuring that U.S. votes in the IMF are strictly in accordance with the agency's rules and economic objectives rather than allowing them to be influenced by political considerations.

However, that argument increasingly has been challenged by human-rights activists, leaders of the American black community and other opponents of South Africa's white supremacy policies. They charge that international agencies like the IMF have become convenient, backdoor devices for quietly channeling aid to countries like South Africa, whose domestic policies are bitterly opposed by many Americans.

By helping South Africa bolster its slumping economy, these critics charge, the United States has thrown away one of its most effective potential weapons for putting pressure on the Vorster government. As long as the United States helps keep money coming through agencies like the IMF, they contend. Vorster will be justified in dismissing Washington's remonstrances as "totally irrelevant."

This dissenting viewpoint has been heard with growing frequency in the months since concern with human rights became a major element of U.S. foreign policy. For example, it was the basis of a recent, unsuccessful attempt in Congress to restrict U.S. contributions to some international lending agencies by specifying they could not be used to assist seven countries charged with human rights violations.

South Africa wasn't among them. But, the size and importance of the aid it received from the IMF make it perhaps the best illustration of the problem.

The IMF's balance-of-payments assistance to South Africa the last two years was greater than the combined IMF assistance to all other African countries the same period. In those two years, only two other nations, Britain and Mexico, were bigger beneficiaries of IMF aid.

Of the total received by South Africa, an estimated $107 million came from the U.S. government's contribution to IMF funds. Even more important, the United States, as the IMF's largest contributor and most influential member, probably could have blocked the South Africa loans by objecting.

Instead, U.S. representatives on the IMF's executive board supported the South African requests during closed-door deliberations.

That is revealed by minutes of executive board meetings, obtained by writers James Morrell and David Gisselquist working on a South Africa study for the Center for International Policy, a private, Washington-based political research group.

The documents show the process began in January, 1976, when South Africa applied to the IMF for help in fighting problems it said had been caused by rising imports, a slump in exports and resulting drain on reserves.

During subsequent internal IMF discussions, according to the documents, Thomas Leddy, one of the U.S. delegates to the executive board, strongly endorsed the South African requests.

With this U.S. encouragement, the IMF gave South Africa loans totaling $366 million in 1976. That was during the Ford administration when U.S. policy, under Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, tended to emphasize the carrot rather than the stick in dealing wtih South Africa.

The documents do not cover IMF deliberations on South Africa in 1977. However, diplomatic sources say, U.S. delegates to the IMF have continued to support additional South African loan requests through the first year of the Carter administration.

As a result, by October, total IMF aid to South Africa had mounted to $463 million. These loans were made at the same time the Carter administration, in line with its much-advertised championing of human rights, was taking an outspokenly critical task toward the Vorster government.

When asked about the apparent contradictions, administration officials reply that Washington has no single yardstick by which economic decisions on South Africa are made.

Since 1964, for example, U.S. policy has prohibited the Export-Import Bank, a government-controlled and funded agency that provides financing for U.S. sales overseas, from making direct loans to South African purchasers of U.S. products.

However, the bank is permitted to guarantee financing of loans obtained from private U.S. banks by South African importers of U.S. goods. Another federal agency, the Commodity Credit Corp., administered by the Agriculture Department, is allowed to lend money to South Africa for purchase of U.S. farm products.

The State Department follows what it calls "a neutral policy" of neither opposing nor encouraging U.S. business investment in South Africa. Instead, department officials say, they try to ensure that potential investors are aware of South Africa's internal political problems and to urge them to follow "enlightened racial employment policies."

"Neutrality" is also the word used by administration officials when discussing the U.S. role in the IMF. U.S. representatives there, they say, are instructed to approach decisions on strictly economic grounds, taking into account IMF rules about whether the country in question has a balance-of-payments problem caused by external factors beyond its control.

However, those who oppose that policy point out that the United States frequently has used its votes and influence in other international lending agencies such as the World Bank, the Asian Development Fund and the Inter-American Development Bank for frankly political purposes.

The Carter administration has been especially active in applying human rights considerations to its votes in many of these institutions. Recently, for example, Washington blocked an IADB loan to El Salvador for a hydroelectric project because of human rights factors. Then, when U.S. officials detected improvements they wanted to encourage, Washington reversed itself and offered to put up roughly half the loan.

In the view of human rights activists, South Africa has been treated more favorably by the United States and other industrial powers dominating the IMF. They point to the sizeable U.S. and European investments there, the high percentage of South Africans foreign debt held by American and European banks and the strategic importance to the West of South Africa's mineral exports.

In the study they are preparing, Gisselquist and Morrell cite these charges and argue that political considerations should not—indeed, cannot—be divorced from any assessment of South Africa's economic situation.

They contend that South Africa's economic problems primarily are due not to an externally caused trade imbalance, but to overspending rooted in the high cost of repress-ing the 83 per cent of the population that is black or colored.

The buttress this argument, they cite a confidential IMF study in April that lists South Africa's defense budget as "a major cause of the rapid increase in total current expenditure; its share of total expenditure has risen from 14 per cent in 1973–74 to 20 per cent in 1976–77."

"As a grisly footnote to the IMF's aid to South Africa," Gisselquist and Morrell add. "the April, 1977, IMF study said that the increase in military spending in 1976–77 came to $450 million—almost exactly the amount of IMF assistance."

The executive board minutes obtained by the two writers show that the only delegate to raise these points was Antoine W. Yameogo of Upper Volta, representing 17 black African countries.

The only doubts voiced by delegates from industrial nations involved questions about whether South Africa had caused its problems by keeping sizeable gold stocks off the export market in anticipation of higher world prices.

Even that objection was dismissed by U.S. delegate Leddy. The documents quote him as saying that "South Africa's export shortfall was probably due to factors largely beyond its control." Accordingly, he found the assistance request reasonble and worthy of support.

In summing up, Gisselquist and Morrell state: "Each of the IMF meetings covered in the minutes was held behind closed doors. Thus while South Africa was earning world condemnation for its racist policies, it was receiving a more tangible measure of support from the IMF. It is difficult to imagine any other international forum in which support would be forthcoming."

HOW THE IMF SLIPPED $464 MILLION TO SOUTH AFRICA

(By James Morrell and David Gisselquist)

Despite reservations expressed by delegates of 22 African and European countries, the International Monetary Fund in 1976 granted South Africa a record-high aid package of $366 million which by December 1977 had increased to $464 million. This was more than all the rest of the countries in Africa put together received during the same two years and was exceeded in the world only by loans to England and Mexico. Of the $464 million to South Africa, the United States provided $107 million through its contribution to the IMF.

The objecting European and African delegates to the IMF maintained that South Africa didn't really need the monetary agency's assistance, and furthermore, that the South African government had created many of its own economic problems through overspending. The delegates representing West Germany, Italy, Spain and Portugal even charged that the IMF deliberately rigged its own statistical formula to favor the South African request.

But the U.S. and British delegates to these closed-door meetings in 1976 spoke up strongly in favor of the South African request. The IMF's aid, said the British delegate, would among other things give the South African authorities "some feeling of international support," which in his opinion they deserved. With this strong Anglo-African backing, the IMF gave South Africa all it asked for.

THE BACKGROUND: DEFENSE EXPENDITURES

The major component of the South African government's overspending which, through an indirect process, led the government to request aid from the IMF, was a massive and continuing increase in the defense budget. From 1972 to 1975, defense expenditures rose by 97 per cent in real terms. For 1976/1977 another real 25 per cent increase in defense expenditure was budgeted by the South African government. An April 1977 IMF study of recent economic developments in South Africa noted:

In order to accommodate an increase of close to 40 per cent in defense expenditure [in nominal terms] and to ensure at the same time that total government expenditure would not increase in real terms, other government expenditure was budgeted to rise in 1976/77 by only 6 per cent in nominal terms and thus to decline substantially in real terms.

For the 1977/1978 budget, the IMF study reported another large increase:

With defense expenditure budgeted to rise by 21.3 per cent to R 1,654 million [$1.9 billion], the budget provided for other government expenditures to increase in 1977/78 by only 5.1 per cent in nominal terms.

"Defense expenditure has been a major cause of the rapid increase in total current expenditure," the IMF accordingly concluded in its confidential April 1977 economic study, and in turn this rapid increase in government spending led to record budget deficits of 6.8 per cent of gross national product in 1975 and over 7 per cent of GNP in 1976. Government deficits of 7 per cent of GNP for South Africa would be comparable to a $110 billion deficit for the United States, twice the actual for 1976.

These massive budget deficits caused by increased expenditures fueled inflation in South Africa because the government was in effect printing money to pay for more weapons. From 1971 through 1975, money and near-money together increased at about 20 per cent a year. In turn, this inflation caused balance of payments problems as South Africa tried to peg its exchange rate to maintain currency value through foreign borrowing, import taxes, and other restrictions on trade. Although the IMF study does not give a figure for South Africa's arms imports—understandably a very sensitive subject—the study does report "increases in expenditures on defense equipment" as a cause of balance of payments and terms of trade problems in 1976. Defense expenditures leading to budget deficits, budget deficits leading to inflation, inflation leading to balance of payments problems—this is the indirect path by which South Africa arrived at the IMF's door; in addition there was the direct increment to the balance of payments deficit caused by rising arms imports.

JANUARY 1976 REQUEST FOR STAND-BY ARRANGEMENT

Although South Africa's real problem was internal and political in nature—the ever-rising expense of repressing 83 per cent of the country's population—it presented its case to the IMF as purely externally induced: lagging exports, declining reserves, and a deterioration in the balance of payments. Meeting in Washington on January 21, 1976, the IMF's executive board patiently listened to the South African arguments. The delegate from the Netherlands and four other countries responded by saying he was quite prepared to "go along with" the South African request for a stand-by arrangement and an initial $93 million loan, although he fed the government had created many of its own difficulties by overspending and fueling domestic inflation.

The first serious objection, according to the confidential minutes of the meeting, was voiced by Jacques de Groote, executive director for Belgium, Austria, Luxembourg and Turkey. "South Africa had at its disposal one of the world's largest gold stocks," de Groote reminded his listeners, and with the recent increase in gold prices might easily have been expected to contribute to the IMF rather than seek its aid. He acknowledged that South Africa could not easily sell off its gold reserves for dollars without disrupting the world gold market—a situation that called into question the theoretical/value of gold itself as a reserve asset. But he and others questioned the South African gold mine conservation policy of cutting back production every time the world price rose. The authorities were deliberately keeping gold off the market rather than selling it at lower prices to cover their balance of payments deficit. "It could be argued that the current account deficit expected in 1976 was not entirely beyond the control of the authorities," the Belgian director drily concluded. He did not endorse the South African request.

Then came the turn of Antoine W. Yameogo of Upper Volta, speaking for 17 black African nations. South Africa valued its gold reserves at the official price of $42 an ounce, he complained, while the market price was $130 an ounce. Valued at the market price its reserves amounted to $2.7 billion, or the equivalent of about six months' imports. (Three months' cover is generally considered adequate.) South Africa could manage its short-term problem, he said. Its real problem was long-term and structural: its treatment of the black population, which represented 83 per cent of the total population but occupied only 13 per cent of the land. "The education of black people in South Africa [is] not free, their wages and salaries [are] very low relative to those of whites, and the distribution of income and of opportunitity in general [is] heavily weighted toward the white population," he pointed out. In the future, when South Africa needed increasingly skilled and literate workers to compete in world markets, it would not have them. Like all the speakers Yameogo carefully couched his political arguments in economic terms. But despite his objections, the IMF approved South Africa's request for a stand-by arrangement. (Any request that reaches the executive board is assured of approval.)

NOVEMBER 1976 REQUEST FOR LOANS FROM COMPENSATORY FINANCING FACILITY

In November 1976, five months after the first shootings in Soweto, South Africa returned to the IMF with another aid request for $186 million from the compensatory financing facility, which along with earlier loans under the standby arrangement brought the total of IMF loans up to $366 million in 1976. Whereas the stand-by loans initiated in January 1976 required South Africa to show merely a need and a program to correct the balance of payments problems, the November request for compensatory financing of an export shortfall required South Africa to argue that its balance of payments problems were externally caused by circumstances beyond its control. An IMF-conducted staff analysis of South Africa's export performance supported South Africa's request for aid. The staff analysis was, however, severely criticized as well as praised in the executive board's November 1976 meeting. Lamberto Dini, representing IMF staff analysis "suspect" because its estimate of export earning shortfall happened to coincide exactly with the maximum amount South Africa could request under the compensatory financing facility. The West German delegate, Eckard Pieske, also found this coincidence remarkable and flatly stated that the projected shortfall had been "tailored to the size of the requested drawing." The IMF had rigged its own statistical calculations to help South Africa. But Thomas Leddy, the U.S. representative sent by the Ford administration, found the staff's handling of the statistics entirely reasonable. Again South Africa got all it had requested.

The minutes do not cover IMF executive board meetings in 1977. But the Carter administration quietly supported an additional $56 million loan to South Africa in 1977 even while castigating the white-supremacy government in public. Washington's time-honored tradition of slapping the wrist while greasing the palm was observed once more.

Each of the IMF meetings covered in the minutes was held behind closed doors. Thus while South Africa was earning world condemnation for its racist policies it was receiving a more tangible measure of support from the IMF. It is difficult to imagine any other international forum in which such support would be forthcoming.

As a grisly footnote to the IMF's aid to South Africa, the April 1977 IMF study said that the increase in military spending in 1976/1977 came to $450 million—almost exactly the amount of IMF assistance.

The study also revealed that, according to U.S. figures, foreign investment in South Africa paid the highest return of any foreign investment in the world—a fact that, along with the high strategic value of South Africa's mineral exports, goes far to explain the enthusiasm of Anglo-American support for aid to the apartheid government. British investments in South Africa are estimated at $7 billion, and U.S. investments at a book value of $1.6 billion.

WITTEVEEN FACILITY

Despite South Africa's successful manipulation of the IMF in 1976, the Carter administration is trying to rush through Congress a new $1.7 billion U.S. contribution to the IMF's Witteveen supplementary financing facility (so-called because it was initiated by the IMF's outgoing managing director Johannes Witteveen). Again South Africa would be an eligible borrower. So far there has been surprisingly little Congressional opposition. A House Appropriations subcommittee on foreign aid chaired by Rep. Clarence Long, Democrat of Maryland, has asked the administration to report the IMF's aid plans to the committee in advance, and Tom Harkin, Democrat of Iowa, intends to offer a human rights amendment to the IMF funding bill. The amendment, similar to those already in effect on the U.S. bilateral aid program and U.S. participation in the multilateral development banks, would require the United States to oppose IMF loans to countries guilty of a "consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights," including death, torture, arbitrary arrests and detention without charges. Both Congressional initiatives, however, fall short of opposing the Witteveen facility directly.

The IMF's decision to funnel $464 million in aid to South Africa when that aid was urgently needed elsewhere may prompt many on Capitol Hill to take a closer look at the overall qualifications of the IMF to administer the vast sums being sought for the Witteveen facility, of which the pending $1.7 billion U.S. contribution is probably only the first installment. The IMF's obsession with secrecy is likely to be a particular issue. Although the IMF fiercely defends its secret procedures as necessary to its operations, the South African transaction illustrates how the long-term costs of secrecy may eventually outweigh its advantages by eroding public trust.

It bears repeating that the IMF's decision to aid South Africa could scarcely have survived public debate and scrutiny in any open forum in the Western world; it needed bureaucrats meeting in the privileged secrecy of the IMF headquarters to approve such aid. The bureaucrats have now abused that privilege of secrecy, and many in Congress will wish to deprive them of it; no issue so effectively welds together anti-foreign aid conservatives and pro-human rights liberals as the privileges of the international financial institutions. The privilege of secrecy allows the IMF to receive confidential information from its member governments, but it also allows the IMF to abuse the confidence of its member populations. It enhances the influence of the IMF but cripples the power of the public. The IMF's partisans will urge the advantages of confidentiality and the costs of openness, and with great justification; without the cloak of secrecy, the IMF's operations could become incredibly cumbersome. Yet as great as the advantages of secrecy are, the cost to democracy is greater. Openness, democracy, public accountability—these are alien principles to the IMF and their application would cause it great inconvenience. It is surely this type of inconvenience Winston Churchill had in mind when he said that democracy is the worst form of government ever invented, except for all the others.

EXCERPTS FROM IMF EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETINGS ON SOUTH AFRICA

January 21, 1976 meeting to discuss request for stand-by arrangement. Pieter Lieftinck, representing the Netherlands, Cyprus, Israel, Romania and Yugoslavia: "prepared to go along with the stand-by request."

Mr. Lieftinck thought that South Africa had fared quite well during the world recession. The real rate of growth in South Africa had remained positive while the growth rate in a large number of other countries had been negative. Even more impressive was the fact that unemployment had remained very low, no more than 0.5 percent of the labor force, although it was not clear to what extent the low rate was attributable to official policies. In 1975 the Government had introduced rather strong expansionary policies, and the labor force engaged by the public sector had gradually increased, although the precise amount had not been reported. . . .

The final 1976/77 budget had not been completed, Mr. Lieftinck said, but available information suggested that there would not be much retrenchment of fiscal expenditure. Apparently, the expectation was that the deficit would be reduced only from 6.5 per cent of GDP to 6 per cent, which, given the present economic conditions in South Africa, still seemed too high . . .

In view of the present policy stance, the relatively low level of reserves, and the anticipated continuing balance of payments deficit, he was quite prepared to go along with the stand-by request.

Peter J. Bull, representing the United Kingdom: standby arrangement "would give the authorities . . . some feeling of international support, which they deserved."

The South African economy had certainly fared well in comparison with others during the world recession. Although the fiscal deficit had become quite large, unemployment had remained very low, and the growth rate had been satisfactory compared with others. . . . On the external side, however, the outlook did not seem as promising, and the authorities would probably face a number of risks in the coming months. He was therefore pleased that South Africa had requested a stand-by arrangement which would give the authorities some additional room for maneuver and some feeling of international support, which they deserved; the Government was making considerable efforts to deal with its balance of payments problems, and he fully supported the proposed decision.

Jacques de Groote, representing Belgium, Austria, Luxembourg and Turkey: current account deficit "was not entirely beyond the control of the authorities."

South Africa had at its disposal one of the world's largest gold stocks, and a superficial analysis of the country's situation would therefore lead to the conclusion that, with the recent increase in the gold price, South Africa would have experienced no difficulty in financing its deficits and, in fact, could easily have been one of the lenders under the oil facility. Such an interpretation would of course have been incorrect, for the simple reason that the realities of the gold market were quite different from the conceptions of it that were held in many circles, as was clear from the need to set up rather complicated machinery in order to make usable a small fraction of the Fund's gold to help finance the Trust Fund.

South Africa's present situation, Mr. de Groote continued, clearly demonstrated, better than any theoretical analysis could do, that gold was no longer the major reserve asset that it was widely considered to be . . .

It would be useful, Mr. de Groote said, to know more about the relationship between gold production techniques and the balance of payments situation, since the practice had been to switch from the most productive mines to marginal ones according to fluctuations in the market price of gold. It could be argued that the current account deficit expected in 1976 was not entirely beyond the control of the authorities. A country should make the best possible use of its commodities and resources in support of its policies, and, conceivably, the most productive mines could produce more gold at lower costs, which could be sold at lower prices to cover the balance of payments deficit.

Antoine de Yameogo, representing Upper Volta and 17 other black African nations: "basic problems in South Africa . . . were structural ones."

Mr. Yameogo considered that, technically speaking, the stand-by request was justified. However, the current account deficit, although quite large, seemed more than compensated for by the capital account surplus in 1975, as shown in Table 13 in SM/76/8. In addition, more than half the official foreign reserves consisted of gold computed on the basis of the official price of US$42 per ounce, while the market price was US$130 per ounce. The amount of the stand-by request was relatively small, and South Africa could borrow the same amount elsewhere by using its gold as collateral, thus preserving its access to the Fund and avoiding contributing to the fall in the price of gold in the market. Valued at the market price, the gold held by South Africa was worth about SDR 1.8 billion, thus making total reserves equal to more than SDR 2.3 billion, or the equivalent of about six months' imports.

The short-term problems described in the report could be dealt with, Mr. Yameogo commented. In the long run, however, the future of South Africa would depend on its relations with African countries rather than with non-African ones. . . .

The basic problems in South Africa, Mr. Yameogo considered, were structural ones. . . .

November 10, 1976 meeting to consider compensatory financing request, Lamberto Dini, representing Italy, Spain, Portugal and Malta: staff's calculations are "suspect."

So far as the shortfall was concerned, the staff had departed from current practice, since it had not arrived at an estimate of the possible shortfall in the leading export commodity, namely, gold. Naturally, forecasting the future of gold prices was difficult, but if the Fund intended to allow purchases under the compensatory financing facility, it should be prepared to make forecasts of market developments in all relevant commodities, including gold. He would therefore like to see the staff intensify its analytical work on the gold market, and present the result to the Executive Directors when appropriate.

Regarding the nongold merchandise exports, Mr. Dini stated, he had some difficulties with the group entitled "exports other than primary commodities," which included manufactures and semiprocessed products. The staff argued that the shortfall in that category was due mainly to the world recession; and it supported its conclusion by identifying business cycle conditions and the export price index in the industrial countries as the explanatory variables for South Africa's merchandise exports. However, another factor with some effect on merchandise exports must be the level of domestic economic activity, if only because in a country like South Africa goods produced for exports were also in demand at home. In 1975 South Africa had pursued relatively expansionary domestic policies, and consumption and other expenditures had remained at a high level during the first half of 1976. He could therefore not accept the staff view that the shortfall in exports other than primary commodities was due largely to external circumstances, and he would like the staff to provide some explanation. The staff's calculations were the more suspect because the shortfall calculated by the staff appeared to be exactly equal to the amount—50 per cent of quota—requested by South Africa plus the amount of calculated double compensation under the previous drawings from the Fund.

Although he was not happy with the analytical reasoning presented by the staff, Mr. Dini observed, he would support the proposed decision on judgmental grounds. South Africa qualified for the requested drawing even if the shortfall in the group "other exports" was much lower than the one calculated by the staff once the shortfall on account of gold was included.

Thomas Leddy, representing the United States: "prepared to support the request."

Mr. Leddy agreed with Mr. de Vries that the existence of a balance of payments need in South Africa was clearly established. One of the primary causes of the current difficulties had been the authorities' excessive optimism about an export revival and changes in the terms of trade, which had made them reluctant to adopt the needed adjustment measures. South Africa's export shortfall was probably due to factors largely beyond its control. The calculation of the export shortfall had apparently not been dependent on any assumptions with respect to gold, and the staff's approach in that respect was reasonable. He was therefore prepared to support the request.

Eckard Pieske, representing West Germany: "shortfall appeared to be tailored to the size of the requested drawing."

Mr. Pieske said that he agreed with the staff's judgment that South Africa had met all the requirements for a drawing under the compensatory financing facility. On the other hand, he noted that the staff had said that South Africa was cooperating with the Fund, and had instanced the conclusion of the recent stand-by arrangement. He therefore wondered to what extent the targets in the stand-by arrangement were being met. He was particularly interested in even a provisional answer, since the targets laid down in an earlier stand-by arrangement had not all been met.

The shortfall had been calculated largely on the basis of the projected annual growth rate of 16 per cent for nongold exports and of 17 per cent for the so-called "other merchandise exports," Mr. Pieske noted. He agreed with Mr. Dini that the shortfall appeared to have been tailored to the size of the requested drawing, and the assumed annual growth rates used for the purpose appeared rather high.

Mr. ABOUREZK. I think I will save copies of these for any of my colleagues who would like to see them now, but I think if the managers of this legislation were to inquire with a little bit of depth, they would see that the policies engendered by the International Monetary Fund, which puts such severe restrictions on social-economic rights within the underdeveloped countries, are creating deprivations which no Member of this Senate would abide if he knew they existed.

With the understanding that I be allowed to ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment at a later time, and for a short time for debate after 3 o'clock, I will yield the floor.

Mr. JAVITS. Madam President, I think it is important to lay out our case in advance of further debate, just as the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK) has laid out his case.

The managers of the bill, insofar as I know—certainly that goes for myself—are opposed to this amendment, for the following reasons: If the amendment is to mean anything, it must be taken at its word in terms of its general purpose, and the United States must be committed to do everything it possibly can to carry it through. Otherwise there would not be good faith involved in respect to the adoption of such an amendment.

In other words, even though one could cynically dismiss this amendment and say, "Well, all it does, really, when you get to its operative provisions, is require the U.S. executive director 'to oppose all such transactions which would contribute to such deprivations or violations,'" then one could say, "OK, even if the U.S. executive director opposes it, if the other executive directors approve, the loan from the supplementary facility would be made, so what is all the argument about? If this is just rhetoric, let us just pass it and forget it."

If we were to be that cynical about this matter, one would approach it in one way. But I cannot be that cynical. I believe too much in human rights, and I believe that is true of the great majority of people in this Chamber. So we have to decide whether we really want to make this a criterion for the use of the supplementary financing facility, because in good faith, should we do that, we would expect that the Secretary of the Treasury and the President would use all their enormous power and influence for the purpose of killing off any use of the supplementary financing facility by any nation which, as this proposal particularly says, engages in a pattern of violation of human rights or deprivation of basic human needs.

Madam President, in my judgment the real "nubbin" of this thing is found in the words "contribute to the deprivation of basic human needs," not in the human rights part of it. It is to be noticed that these matters are joined.

Nobody is going to condone torture or other inhuman activities which we pledge all our national honor to oppose in respect of anything the United States does.

But when we deal with "deprivation of basic human needs" we completely nullify the purposes of the International Monetary Fund and its function and the reason for this supplementary financing facility, because the supplementary financing facility is only to be invoked as a banking matter. After all, this is a monetary organization, engaged in banking functions. It is only to be invoked for borrowing purposes when all else has failed, including the full utilization by the individual borrowing nation of all of its rights to draw on the International Monetary Fund. Most nations which are members, and would therefore be eligible for the supplementary financing facility, have certain drawing rights, and those drawing rights are their right, not a privilege but a right, and so they can draw on them with very few conditions. They can do it in three stages, as their condition worsens. In the first stage there are practically no conditions; in the second stage there are some conditions; in the third stage there are some more conditions. But none of these three stages involves conditions which are deeply severe, and would be as severe as the conditions which would be imposed, by the IMF for the use of the supplementary financing facility.

Madam President, it is simply inconceivable, taking the definition of basic human rights set forth in the report section on this amendment, and that is the way the amendment would have to be read, that if you are going to impose conditions—and one must in this last resort use of the supplementary financing facility, otherwise what good is the financing facility, if it is just going to be a carryover loan with the same conditions which have drained away practically to the point of insolvency everything the borrowing nation has been able to do up to the point where it calls for the supplementary facility? Then the IMF would not be performing its banking function, and we would have no business to go into it.

What it has to be is a bridge to a better future, and in order to make that bridge to a better future there has to be belt tightening, and therefore it is bound to have an effect upon everybody in a given country which has come, through its own actions, to this condition.

Undoubtedly, without any question, looking at the definition, for example, of basic human needs which is contained in subsection (c) of this amendment, there would be a deprivation of basic human needs. It is inconceivable that people in that country will be able to enjoy—to obtain, as the language is—public services, including health care, education, clean water, energy resources, and transportation. As a matter of fact, there are many countries in which they could not be obtained under the best of circumstances, let alone if the country were reduced financially to the condition to which it is reduced.

So, Madam President, we would be dedicating ourselves to the defeat of the very discipline which is essential in order to restore these countries to some kind of a viable condition, so that they could go on, thereafter, without complete dependence upon an international corporation which cannot be made available to them, in financial terms, for any indefinite future, unless they commit themselves to a regime of very grave stringency.

Therefore, this amendment really, in essence, is based upon the theory that "you owe us this." I condemn that theory, time and again. Neither we nor any other nation owe it. A nation, as a price of nationhood, must have a certain amount of willingness and ability to sacrifice; otherwise it should remain some kind of part of some other nation, or ward of some other nation. We cannot simply have an international program which confers nationhood and at the same time accepts a custody and responsibility for a sovereign nation. If the developing countries are proud of their nationhood, as they are, then they should be proud of their willingness to sacrifice both in terms of defending themselves and in economic terms, in belt tightening, in order to put themselves in some kind of viable economic condition.

The world represented in the international fund is recognizing the responsibility to help, but to help to what? To help to a condition where a nation that deserves nationhood is viable. This amendment would tend to negate the real purpose and effect of the supplementary financing facility. If we administered it honestly, the United States would be mandated to use all its vast authority and power in the world to deny the use of the supplementary financial facility to the very nations which would need it the most, because it is a monetary facility and not a political facility.

We would still be engaging in bilateral aid, and in other activities of that character, which is perfectly proper but not germane to the supplementary financing facility.

The Senator from South Dakota mentioned a very interesting case in point, Jamaica. I would like to deal with that, if I may.

An article appeared in the Washington Post of July 24, 1978, authored by Art Pine, on this very subject. This is the second of two articles. I ask unanimous consent that both articles be printed in the RECORD, though I will be dealing primarily only with the latter.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOW, WHEN THE IMF TALKS, MORE NATIONS ARE LISTENING

(By Art Pine)

Last February, a four-member field team was quietly sent from the International Monetary Fund to the Zambian capital, Lusaka, for discreet negotiations. The subject: the Zambian government's request for a $305 million emergency loan to save the country's credit by underwriting its heavy balance-of-payments deficit.

After 21 days of delicate discussions, Zambia had its money. But in return, Prime Minister Kenneth Kaunda had to promise to devalue his country's currency and slash government spending. The devaluation meant higher prices for imports, and the spending cuts meant reductions in income. The two actions lowered the Zambian standard of living, but the government had no choice. It was either accept the IMF's conditions or go bankrupt.

What occurred isn't unusual, but it serves to illustrate a point. The fund, a 130-nation organization whose job is to police the badly strained world monetary system, is gaining increased power and influence over its members' affairs—often, in the case of weaker nations, to the point of setting the terms of their domestic economic policies.

Besides the Zambia case, the fund has forced stringent austerity measures in 21 deficit-plagued nations over the past several years. In 1974 and 1977, it issued new lines of credit to Italy and the United Kingdom. In June, it approved a loan to Jamaica. And now, IMF officials are in the midst of negotiating with war-torn Zaire. What's more, international experts say the fund's clout is growing almost daily.

The question is, how is the IMF's bureaucracy, housed in a bulky, atrium-topped building on 19th Street, exercising its new power? Some critics say the fund is too arbitrary and inflexible—overly tough on developing countries, and insensitive to the "human" consequences of the belt-tightening it prescribes for problem-ridden nations.

Indeed, fund-mandated government austerity programs recently led to rioting in Peru and Egypt, with residents protesting their leaders' decisions to raise domestic prices. And diplomats from some developing nations regularly grouse that IMF officials demand more of smaller countries than large ones. "If the big countries resist," says one, "the fund disappears."

The increased clout is a relatively recent phenomenon. Only a few years ago, the IMF's attempts to give countries economic advice were treated as little more than a gentleman's game. Fund field representatives held annual "consultations" with all member governments. But their urgings were taken with a grain of salt—particularly if the sitting government disagreed.

But now, with the past few years' dramatic changes in the world economic situation, the fund has become a power to be reckoned with. "These days," says one international economist, "when the IMF talks, more and more countries are listening." And so are private banks and other international lending institutions.

The big multinational banks, in fact, are among the big winners in the fund's hard-line approach. Although the money lent by the IMF ostensibly is for government-to-government balance-of-payments transactions, once it's in a country's hands it can be used to pay off loans to private banks if need be. And the IMF's policy prescriptions serve to guarantee the banks that the country will be a better credit risk.

The IMF's heightened new influence stems basically from two developments:

The sharp rise in oil prices the Arab nations engineered in 1973 has thrown more countries into deficit—and dependence on IMF loans to save them from bankruptcy. Since private banks rely heavily on IMF judgments—and backup—in their own lending to countries, the fund's pronouncements on policy have extra weight. If a nation wants the IMF's seal of approval, it has to toe the line.

Th recent overhaul of the international monetary system has given the fund formal new authority to exercise "surveillance" over problem countries that have severe payments imbalances. While no one yet knows precisely how much power that entails, the charter revisions have given the IMF's recommendations increased status.

The fund's say-so over domestic economic policies of individual countries stems primarily from its power over its own purse strings—specifically, the conditions it sets for making loans to countries that are in difficulty over exceptionally large balance-of-payments deficits. (A country gets into deficit when its imports and investments abroad outstrip its exports and intake of capital.)

The IMF's role in the world economic system essentially is that of a policeman for the "haves"—other fund members, the nations that have lent money to financially troubled countries, and, indirectly, the large multinational banks. (The World Bank, the fund's sister organization, deals with helping the "have-nots" by offering grants or low-interest loans for economic development projects in poor countries.)

If a rich or poor nation gets into balance-of-payments difficulty, the fund steps in—often as lender of last resort—with an offer to help bail out that government by providing a sizable line of credit. But the credit is hinged on the condition that the country adopt stringent fiscal and monetary policies designed to eliminate its payments deficit. The more a country wants to borrow, the stiffer the terms the IMF sets. Often, by the time a country seeks fund help, it's too late for anything but severe belt-tightening.

Fund officials argue that the tradeoff is fair enough: Were it not for the IMF's underwriting, the individual nations would go bankrupt, and would have to impose much harsher austerity programs than those the fund insists on. Like a benevolent banker, the fund aims for gradually restoring economic health to the deficit country—not pay up on the spot.

Under the basic IMF loan system, nations may borrow up to 100 percent of their "quota," or membership fee in the fund, divided into four separate "tranches" or lending categories, each with a progressively tougher set of strings attached. There also are special longer-term lending pools from which members may borrow additional amounts.

It's the power to set conditions for making loans that gives the fund most of its clout. The organization's charter is worded vaguely enough that officials are free to establish whatever terms they think are needed. Talks between the government and fund representatives often last for weeks. At the end, everything must be approved by the IMF executive board.

The results often are striking. In Zambia's case, for example, the government won a credit line of $305 million, but had to devalue its currency by 10 percent and sharply slash spending. Great Britain won authority to borrow up to $4 billion, but had to raise interest rates and pare spending. Jamaica received $244 million—after devaluing and promising to slow wage increases.

Moreover, the IMF continues to influence national policies even after a loan is granted, because the aid usually is only for a year or so and requires a "performance evaluation" for renewal. So, Jamaica this year had to renegotiate a new domestic economic program after its 1977 efforts failed to meet the fund's criteria. And IMF officials prodded Sri Lanka into its most sweeping economic reforms ever.

IMF authorities insist the fund doesn't "dictate" domestic policies to individual countries. In the first place, the terms it sets almost always are worded in the euphemisms of international economics, unlikely to offend any government. "We never ask a country to devalue its currency," an insider says. "We just agree on limits for net foreign assets of its central bank."

Secondly, fund negotiators almost always suggest several options for governments on each major issue. In the Zambian case, for example, IMF representatives suggested five or six approaches for achieving each economic goal, and then Zambian officials chose among them, based on domestic political considerations.

There's often been criticism that the IMF's judgments are made by staff, not political officials, meaning that a nation's policies, in effect, are determined by sometimes youthful economists who never have been elected to office. In essence, that criticism is accurate. But often the IMF staff members are experienced. And in all cases, their work is reviewed by top fund officials and the executive board.

In the case of the Zambian negotiations, all four fund field team members were economists: a 40-year-old Italian, who has spent his career with the IMF and other international economic institutions; a 33-year-old Japanese economist; a 30-year-old Finn, and a 29-year-old London School of Economics graduate who has been at the fund seven years.

Their proposals, the result of weeks of work, were approved by Zambian policymakers and top IMF officials. The decisions at the Zambian end were made by the prime minister and finance minister.

William B. Dale, a former U.S. Treasury official who is the fund's deputy managing-director, insists that "the fund can't dictate a nation's domestic economic policy." Even if a country "agreed to whatever we suggested" he says, "it's they, not we, who administer the policy. They've got to become satisfied the policies are correct before they adopt them."

And Paul A. Volcker, former U.S. undersecretary of the treasury for monetary affairs and now president of the New York Federal Reserve Bank, says the fund's analysts usually are right on target. "You can pick your individual instances where in the hindsight there's been some problem," Volcker says, "but by and large the fund people do their jobs pretty well."

Still, in the end, even fund insiders agree, the bottom line is whether the deficit-plagued country wants the IMF's money and imprimatur. "The borrowing countries accept the terms because they need the IMF's Good Housekeeping seal of approval," says a U.S. official familiar with the negotiation process. "They know they can't function without it."

Adds one high developing-country policymaker involved recently in negotiating an IMF loan for his country: "It's just astonishing how much authority the IMF mission chief has. You're really dealing with a high-class bunch of people here, and on balance I'd have to say they were fair. But the staff has one hell of a lot of clout."

Fund officials deny the agency is more stringent with developing countries than with industrial nations—citing as examples recent demands on the United Kingdom and Italy. "It's fairly obvious we're not going to push big or small countries if they don't want to," one fund source concedes. "The difficulty is, the smaller countries are in financial trouble more often."

Nevertheless, as holder of the purse strings, the fund can get tough when it wants to. In ongoing negotiations with Zaire, a beleaguered Mobuto government already has agreed to give the IMF extensive influence over the country's economic policies as part of a $1 billion plan to bolster its shaky regime. There even will be an IMF "technical adviser" in the Zairian central bank.

And Robert Solomon, a former Federal Reserve Board international monetary adviser who now is at the Brookings Institution, suggests there may be some truth to the charges that larger countries—and those with balance-of-payments surpluses, which theoretically are supposed to be as bad as deficits—emerge less scathed.

"The fund may indeed have been too tough on some countries," Solomon says, "We seem to have fashioned a monetary system with the same old prejudices—that a deficit is bad but a surplus is good." He also is critical of the way IMF policy prescriptions are formulated: "You sometimes get the feeling that some pretty junior staff people are in effect mandating policy."

In any case, there seems to be agreement that the organization's demands are rarely really unfounded. As a U.S. official puts it, "The problem isn't the fund—the problem is the countries are in a bind and need to take drastic steps to get out. The reality is that the IMF loan makes it less painful for these countries to make their adjustments—even with the demands the fund makes."

The question is, how much is the fund's insistence an unwarranted intrusion on national sovereignty? While some countries go kicking and screaming to the IMF's bargaining tables, others seem to welcome the fund's toughness as a cover for imposing needed cutbacks they know will be unpopular. "The fund makes a terrific scapegoat," one policymaker says.

In still other cases, the governments sometimes turn out to be too weak or ill-equipped to carry out cutback programs on their own. In Peru, for example, outside observers say it's unlikely the regime would have been able to slash programs without fund intervention. And onlookers say Zarian officials simply weren't technically able to develop their own programs.

At least some of the criticism over the way the fund treats developing countries may be reduced as a result of a new approach to IMF lending involving longer-term loans. Until recently, the major form of IMF lending has been to extend credit to a country for a year at a time. If the government did not perform as expected, the line of credit simply was canceled.

Under the new program, however, the fund now works out a longer term plan with borrowing nations designed to help restore the local economy over a three-year period. In the case of Jamaica, where Prime Minister Michael Manley has criticized IMF officials for not fully "understanding" poorer nation's needs, policymakers are viewing the new procedure as "a better tool" for the IMF to use.

What is less certain is how much influence the fund will be able to exert on nations that aren't actually trying to borrow money—such as West Germany, Denmark, or even the United States. Although the organization's newly revised charter grants it increased power in this area, the rules of the game haven't been drawn yet. "They're still feeling their way," a knowledgeable onlooker says.

Dale and other IMF officials insist that "we're taking the matter seriously" in trying to develop standards and procedures for policing countries that are not currently borrowing, but some observers are skeptical. "The fact is, they're just not going to be able to force any nation to make cutbacks if it doesn't need IMF money," one observer says.

The issue may be decided quickly, however. Jacques de Larosiere, the fund's new managing-director, was a coauthor (along with former U.S. treasury undersecretary Edwin H. Yeo) of the fund's new "surveillance" power, and is said to be taking a more aggressive stance than his predecessor, former Dutch finance minister H. Johannes Witteveen.

The fund's directors are appointed by the various finance ministries of the IMF's 130 member nations and take their policy instructions from their home governments. The voting power of the directors is weighted according to the size of the economy of the nation they represent. The U.S. director controls just under 21 percent of the votes. Zambia's ballot is counted in with those of several other African nations as a single regional vote.

In any case, the corner has been turned for the once-toothless IMF. To the officials in the Zambian treasury—and others in governments throughout the industrial and developing world—the fund is now a force to be respected. And for better or worse, analysts say that's unlikely to change very soon.

ECONOMIC SHOCK: IMF LOAN TERMS FORCE JAMAICAN BELT TIGHTENING

(By Art Pine)

KINGSTON, JAMAICA.—Away from this lush, mountain-capped Caribbean island, Prime Minister Michael Manley likes to portray Jamaica as a major force in the struggle by developing nations to become economically independent. In speeches in various world capitals, Manley calls repeatedly for a "new international economic order" for poorer countries. He often laments big-power "imperialism."

At home, however, Manley is being forced to put his country's economy through the wringer, precisely to satisfy the demands of these very industrial nations. Almost bankrupt from an outsized balance of payments deficit, Jamaica has had to take out a $244 million, three-year loan from the International Monetary Fund. And that means meeting IMF terms for getting its economy up to snuff.

Jamaica's new belt-tightening is one of 21 cases in the past several years in which the IMF has required borrowing nations to take stringent austerity measures to qualify for multilateral aid—part of the 130-member organization's growing power in the face of changing economic conditions. Technically, the fund doesn't mandate specific policy changes. But it won't lend the money until it's satisfied with a country's program.

To meet the IMF's conditions, Jamaica last month began gulping down a harsh dose of economic medicine that includes a massive 30 percent devaluation of its currency, stringent controls on imports, a series of big tax increases on manufacturing and tourists, higher interest rates, limits on credit expansion and a tight wage ceiling on worker's raises.

The result has been a virtual shock wave for already hard-hit Jamaican workers, and a new jolt for the island's close-knit middle class that has sent many fleeing to the United States. Despite government subsidies, prices of many necessities—such as food and gasoline—have jumped more than 30 percent since early May. Domestic business is off. And jobs are scarce.

A can of condensed milk—a staple to the island's poorer families—now costs more than 50 cents at Jamaican food stores. Cigarettes run $1.36 for a pack of 20. And gasoline now costs $3 a gallon in Jamaican currency. Even beer prices have soared—to 65 cents a bottle, up from 41 cents two weeks ago. Says one prominent union leader: "You look at this thing and you just want to cry."

Moreover, Manley's leftish "democratic socialist" government, which won a landslide victory last December before the country's financial straits were made public, is now coming under increasing criticism from both labor and business. Although the charismatic Manley is not up for reelection until 1981, his supporters concede they're no longer fully confident of being returned to office.

Admittedly, terms or no terms, almost everyone in Jamaica agrees the hardship would have been a lot stiffer if the IMF had rejected Jamaica's loan application. Without the IMF money, a high Jamaican official says, private banks would have curtailed their lending and foreign exporters would have cut off short-term credit, stifling needed trade.

With problems of that magnitude, the remedies would have been harsher. "To try to go it alone would have meant operating a siege economy," a finance ministry official said. "You'd virtually have to retire from international commerce, which would be next to suicide for a country that has to import as much as we do. And that would mean serious political upheaval. There really was no choice."

The question is, did the IMF go too far in prodding Jamaica to accept these harsh terms, and how much did Manley's government have to say about what policies it would adopt to meet the fund's terms? Manley himself often has criticized international lending agencies for failing to take account of the "fragile" economics of developing countries. Was this another such IMF fluff?

The negotiations leading up to last month's loan came against a backdrop of continued decline in the Jamaican economy. Caught amid high oil prices, falling revenues from its sugar exports and a tradition of heavy government spending, Jamaica gradually ran down its monetary reserves. Inflation intensified. Layoffs increased. The nation was facing an economic disaster.

In 1977, Manley applied for—and got—a $78 million line of credit from the fund. But after months of half-hearted cutbacks—including an abortive austerity program imposed after Manley won his December 1976 reelection—Jamaica failed to meet previously agreed on economic targets, and the fund closed the window on the loan. The government tried to get along without the IMF's help but eventually it asked for another loan.

Last February, an IMF field team flew down to Jamaica to begin negotiations for the loan, but—with the previous year's performance in mind—insisted on a much tougher set of conditions. On IMF prodding, Jamaica was forced even before the talks began to agree to a 15 percent currency devaluation. When negotiators did sit down in earnest, fund officials were decidedly stern.

Just how much Jamaica was coerced into adopting the policies it did, and how much flexibility it had to pick and choose, depends on the perspective. Although both sides agree that the fund didn't actually dictate the measures it wanted Manley to adopt, the goals the field team set were so specific, it was hard to avoid the tough decisions.

The fund team was headed by David Finch, a bespectacled, fiftyish Australian who has spent his career as an IMF field representative. Far from being dictatorial, Jamaican officials report, Finch and other staffers were almost deferential about what policies Jamaica would have to adopt. (Earlier, Finch had handled loans to Italy and Great Britain as well.)

As a Jamaican official in on the talks describes it, "They never told us specifically what policies we had to follow to qualify. All they would say was, 'You show me what you want to do and I'll tell you if it's correct.' By the end, we were pleading with them, 'Please just impose your conditions and be done with it.' But they said Jamaica had to make up its own mind."

To their credit, Finch and other team members spent their first several weeks simply studying the Jamaican business leaders to see how much each side would be willing to sacrifice. In the process, even Jamaican officials were astonished at their thoroughness. "I learned a lot about this island," one says, "that I didn't know before."

The negotiators' jobs also were made easier because the loan was carried out under a new form of lending pool that gives borrowing nations up to three years—in contrast to the normal one year—to get their financial houses back in order. And a western observer adds pointedly: "There also was more-than-usual regard for appearances. The IMF people were well aware of third-world attitudes toward the fund."

But ultimately, finance ministry policymakers say, Finch was determined about what Jamaica could and couldn't do. "He's by far the toughest negotiator I've ever run into," says one senior official here. "He'd never say no—just sit there, patiently, like some sort of professor, and then say, 'Yes, but...' The gnawing thing was he was so nice about it you couldn't get angry."

By April, there were only two major points of disagreement:

Jamaican officials resented Finch's demand that they devalue their currency by 30 percent (15 percent at the start, and 15 percent a month until the 30 percent is reached). "Our feeling was that 15 percent in total would have been enough," a high Jamaican official recalls. "But we finally had to do it, all 30 percent."

The second was the government's plans to take over all importing through a state trade corporation. The IMF team contended that with so many of Jamaica's trade transactions now coming through U.S. and British subsidiaries, a takeover now would discourage needed expansion. The result was a compromise: Jamaica would "monitor" imports, and if things got out of hand, Manley could publicly call attention to the problem.

On the rest of the package, there was "virtual unanimity," a ministry official asserts: Jamaica would devalue its dollar according to the IMF formula; Manley would try to hold the line on government spending and boost taxes to reduce the budget deficit; imports would be controlled tightly and wage increases would be held to 15 percent.

There's no question these policies have resulted in hardships. Since the program went into effect last month, prices have risen sharply for almost everything, including basic necessities; retail sales have fallen off visibly, in some cases by as much as 40 percent and workers, deprived of catch-up pay increases, are being caught in a squeeze.

For Jason R., a 48-year-old blue-collar worker (many Jamaicans are loathe to use their full names in print, for fear of losing patronage jobs), the dilemma is acute. The gaunt father of six earns $40 a week at his full-time job. But he must spend $30 for food alone, $10 a week for rent, $5 for transportation and $10 for lunches for his schoolage youngsters.

For now, Jason R. is eking out a living by dipping into a small nest egg the family accrued when his wife worked as a domestic in the United States a few years ago. But in two weeks, that money will be gone, and Mrs. R's visa expired in the interim. "We buy a lot less of everything," he says. 'One pound of flour instead of two, half of what we used to before."

Lascelles Beckford, labor chief of the opposition-allied Bustamante Industrial Trade Union, says such pinching has become commonplace for Jamaica's poorer workers, many of whom still earn the national minimum wage of $24 a week. "You try to write down a typical family's budget," he says, "and you just look at the figures and crumple up the paper. But it's true."

Moreover, the squeeze is so bad it's even hitting the middle class, many of whom are simply giving up and emigrating to Miami. Alvin B., a 29-year-old bank manager, is planning now for just such a move as soon as he can arrange it. "It's really hitting like hell," he says. "We just can't enjoy the same standard of living we had before.

Not surprisingly, union leaders have protested the government's new wage ceiling, which is preventing workers from keeping up with the new rise in prices. Even the Manley-affiliated National Workers' Union is criticizing the prime minister's policies. Says the NWU's president, Carlisle Dunkley: "What we're saying is, 'What assurances can you give us on prices?' And they can't."

Business leaders also are upset. Bruce Rickards, a director of Grace-Kennedy & Co., a major food distributor here, complains that "many items have now been priced out of the reach of ordinary citizens. We're facing problems we've never had before," he says. "The whole thing is turning out to be diminished returns to the very government that needs it. It's a disaster."

Still, despite the widespread hardship, there's been relatively little criticism of the IMF. A nationwide public opinion poll published last week by Carl Stone of the Kingston-based University of the West Indies showed 46 percent of Jamaicans in favor of the IMF loan deal, and 40 percent opposed—not a bad plurality in the island's volatile political structure.

If anything, most of the blame is being laid squarely on Manley. Says the NWU's Dunkley, usually an ally of the prime minister's: "Sure it was a tough deal. But when you go to a bank, you have to do what they tell you. The fact is that Jamaica for too long has delayed the actions needed to restore financial stabiltiy. So now, you might say, the chickens are coming home to roost."

To many observers, the immediate question is whether the government can keep the lid on wages—an element most Jamaican economists regard as the key to the program's success. Although unions and employers are obligated to obey the guidelines, Manley might have to loosen them if opposition intensifies. So far, protests have been perfunctory. But things could heat up if prices rise more.

There also are longer-range problems. As a finance ministry official explains it, the strategy of the IMF team was to use "a short, hopefully temporary jolt of inflation to help dampen workers' buying power and bring consumption into line with production. The problem was solved is it had to be—with a crunch," he says. "It's a novel approach, but we think it will work."

The dilemma is, dampening consumption is only half of what Jamaicans have to do. The other side is to begin spurring production. And on this, Jamaica may well be in an economic Catch 22: To help eliminate its payments deficit, the government must crimp the economy to curtail consumption. But that in turn makes it more difficult to resume production. So, where does the cycle end?

Was the IMF, then, too tough on Jamaica? By a wide majority, both government officials and private-sector spokesmen insist it was not "The negotiations were tough, but the IMF people weren't unfair," says Richard Fletcher, the No. 2 man at Jamaica's embattled finance ministry. "There was only one technical matter on which we disagreed. For the rest we made the key decisions ourselves."

Another top official puts it more candidly: "Just look at the alternatives," he says. "Bilateral aid is a possibility when you have sympathetic men in the State Department, but otherwise I really prefer international organizations. And the big multinational bank boys are nice guys—when you don't need them. When you're in a bind, they just disappear. . . ."

Mr. JAVITS. The article points out that, sure, a major loan of rougly in the $200 million to $250 million range to Jamaica was conditioned upon some very difficult conditions for Jamaica, a very poor country indeed. This is the very critical point I would like to make.

This is speaking of the fact, for example, that prices have had to be put up 30 percent since early May for a country which is very, very poor, and that staples of the most elementary character very materially increased in price causing great hardship to the people in Jamaica, the poor people in Jamaica, and most of them are poor. The article goes on to say:

Admittedly, terms or no terms, almost everyone in Jamaica agrees the hardship would have been a lot stiffer if the IMF had rejected Jamaica's loan application. Without the IMF money, a high Jamaica official says, private banks would have curtailed their lending and foreign exporters would have cut off short-term credit, stifling needed trade.

I continue to quote:

With problems of that magnitude, the remedies would have been harsher. "To try to go it alone would have meant operating a seige economy," a finance ministry official said. "You'd virtually have to retire from international commerce, which would be next to suicide for a country that has to import as much as we do. And that would mean serious political upheaval. There really was no choice."

In short, the adoption of this amendment would be unbelievably harmful to the very poor people whom the amendment ostensibly is designed to help, and would be completely counterproductive. It would make the country poorer, less able to do anything for its poor, than it would be with the conditionality and the tough conditions, but getting the help, nonetheless, of the IMF.

One other things is important. The IMF in setting conditions does not write the conditions for a country but it presents to the country the ultimate objective, financial objective, which has to be attained. That is, what money it can spend compared to what it can take in and how the loan which is coming from the IMF is to be used in an effort to improve its conditions, improve its production, and enable it to attain the goals for which the loan is made, the purpose of the loan being to put the country, over a period of time, 3 to 5 years, into a viable economic condition.

These goals are not, as the economists, say microeconomic goals, that is, some specific regulation about the price of this or interest rates or how to handle exports, what to do about tariffs. The objectives are the ultimate balance of the country in terms of its foreign exchange and in terms of its domestic operations, its creditworthiness, its ability to export and its ability to import, to get the necessary accommodation with respect to its imports, and also to determine the value of its currency. So conditionality often imposed by the IMF goes to the matter of devalution of currency which is overvalued. That was the case in respect of Jamaica.

How the country does it are the macroeconomic goals. How the country does it is up to the country. In short, it is the country itself which will determine whether this is going to be done through the price mechanism, through the interest rate mechanism, through the currency devaluation mechanism, or any combination of those factors.

Again, I quote from this same piece which is so revealing because it relates to a very vivid case in point, to wit, Jamaica:

Was the IMF, then, too tough on Jamaica? By a wide majority, both government officials and private sector spokesmen insist it was not. "The negotiations were tough, but the IMF people weren't unfair," says Richard Fletcher, the number two man in Jamaica's embattled finance ministry. "There was only one technical matter on which we disagreed. For the rest, we made the key decisions ourselves."

In short, the mechanism which is going to be used to attain the result of beginning to put the country back on the road to viability, financial viability, is the choice of the country.

Again, I say the developing countries, and this amendment is very much directed to the developing countries. It is not that the amendment says developing countries, but on page 2, line 25, it refers to "especially as it relates to the poor majority within those countries," which clearly indicates that it is directed to the developing countries. The question is what that country, including a majority of poor people, determines is best for it to do in order to put itself on some kind of a viable road.

Mr. President, it seems to me that that relates directly to the argument which is used to back this amendment respecting "do not contribute to the deprivation of basic human needs." I now pass to the human rights argument.

Again, it deeply appeals to our humanity, to the general policy of the United States, and to what we are doing in many, many areas of our activities, including, and I emphasize this, our AID program, our bilateral activities in this regard. But, Mr. President, again it does not belong here for this reason: It introduces a political note in an international banking enterprise which is a double-edge sword, and we better remember that. We may be working against the activities in genocide—that is taking it to the extreme—in countries where we feel that that is what a violation of basic human rights amounts to. But this is a game which many can play, Mr. President, to introduce these struggles as well as those that we condemn. For example, we must remember that the IMF has both Communists and non-Communists in it, and that itself represents a major source of political division. Yet we are anxious to bring the Communist countries into some kind of relation with the rest of the world. This is extremely important to the future of peace and to the future of the world's economy.

That will represent an immediate line of very strong political division.

Then let us look at a few other struggles. There is the struggle between Greece and Turkey; the struggle between Israel and the Arab States; the struggle between South Africa and the front line black African States; the differences between India and Pakistan. These are the more prominent. There are scores of other potential political and military opponents.

Do we wish to make the IMF a cockpit in which we are going to pit all these people against each other?

Is this not very unwise, from the point of view of the mission of the IMF, through this supplementary fund, trying to bring about a greater degree of viability, or at least an endeavor to have sovereign countries recover their viability, through the utilization of the International Monetary Fund machinery?

Mr. President, it is very illustrative to me, and I cite this as a very important example, that an amendment very much like this one was just rejected by better than 2 to 1 by the other body, where it was endeavored to be put on the Export-Import Bank authorization, the so-called Harkin amendment. That was rejected just last week for precisely the reasons that I am describing: because there are plenty of opportunities, in bilateral aid and other forums, including forums of various other types of assistance and support which the United States gives, to write in human rights conditions; but that it was considered inappropriate to mix up that issue with these banking efforts which are characterized by the IMF and were characterized also by the Eximbank.

The reading of that amendment which the House rejected was almost exactly the amendment which is here presented.

Mr. President, I wish to make just one final point. That is, whom are we benefiting by the IMF facility? Are we not benefiting the very same people whom we are seeking to benefit in these strictures on deprivation of human needs and deprivation of human rights? Are we to say, and I give the signal example of Jamaica, that people who are poor and oppressed are going to be better off if their countries are bankrupt and put into a position of being unable to deal with the basic necessities of life than if we allow them to become economically viable, with an infinitely greater expectation that, if we did, there would be far less deprivation of human needs or deprivation of human rights? I deeply feel that the latter is the intelligent and right course and that, in this particular instance, it would be highly counterproductive to enact an amendment such as has been proposed to us, which I hope, Mr. President, the Senate will reject.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment that has been debated, the Abourezk amendment, I think it is No. 3390, be temporarily set aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1537

(Purpose: To oppose certain assistance by the Supplemental Financing Facility of the International Monetary Fund to Uganda and Cambodia)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1537:

SEC. 3. The President of the United States shall instruct the Executive Director of the United States to the International Monetary Fund to oppose any extension of financial or technical assistance by the Supplemental Financing Facility or by any other agency or facility of such Fund to the Democratic Kampuchea (Cambodia) or the Republic of Uganda, until the President of the United States determines and certifies to the Congress of the United States that Cambodia or Uganda, as the case may be, is in compliance with internationally recognized human rights.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas will not spend a lot of time on this amendment. I think it is a very simple amendment. I understand it may be controversial to some and may be opposed by some members of the committee.

Mr. President, this amendment simply directs the President of the United States to instruct our Nation's Executive Director to the International Monetary Fund to oppose any funding to Cambodia or Uganda, through the supplemental financing facility addressed by this legislation.

As the distinguished floor leaders of this bill have already indicated, the legislation would authorize the U.S. Department of the Treasury to make $1.7 billion available as the U.S. contribution to a supplementary financing facility of the International Monetary Fund. Our delegate has already joined with the other Executive Directors of the IMF in approving the establishment of this so-called "Witteveen Facility," to make these financial resources available to member nations with serious balance-of-payments problems. Under the terms of the Bretton Woods Agreement Act, prior congressional approval is required for our participation in this financing facility.

WORST HUMAN RIGHTS OFFENDERS

The amendment I am proposing would block U.S. support for the use of any of these funds for assistance to Cambodia and Uganda—both of which are members of the IMF—until it is determined that they are in compliance with internationally accepted standards of human rights. I think it is safe to say, Mr. President, that these two countries are among the worst offenders of human rights in the world today—not simply because of political repression or social intimidation, but because of the most brutal and gross violations of human dignity imaginable.

It should not be necessary to remind my colleagues that reports indicate as many as 2 million Cambodians have died as a result of disease, starvation, or direct execution since the Communist regime came to power 3 years ago. At the same time, Amnesty International reports that between 30,000 and 300,000 Ugandans have fallen victim to the regime headed by Idi Amin. Both regimes resort to torture and terrors as a means of retaining their authority. I can think of no responsibility that we have—morally, legally, or otherwise—to provide assistance to either of these countries, to assist their balance-of-payments problems. Yet, both nations are official members of the International Monetary Fund and therefore, I understand, eligible to receive assistance through the supplementary financing facility which is under consideration today.

It seems to this Senator that the amendment is in accord with the objective of this administration and this Congress, to deny aid to those countries which are in severe violation of internationally accepted standards of human rights. It seems to me that this is important whether U.S. aid is extended directly, or indirectly through an international loan organization like the International Monetary Fund.

CONTROL OVER FOREIGN AID

None of us knows at this point whether either of the two governments may request such aid through the International Monetary Fund. But whether they do or not, the principle remains: these two countries are currently eligible for such assistance, and we should make it clear to our delegates that they must object to such applications if they are submitted.

Last Friday, the Senate adopted an amendment placing a U.S. trade embargo on Uganda. That proposal did not address the matter of IMF assistance to Uganda. As a matter of U.S. policy, however, it would be consistent for us to direct our IMF delegates to oppose aid to Uganda. Why should we provide indirectly, what we refuse to provide directly?

I am aware that, under the provisions of our participation in this facility, no actual expenditure of Treasury funds will take place. Nevertheless, the Department of the Treasury does make its resources available—to the extent of approximately $1.7 billion—to make it possible for the facility to assist IMF members with their balance-of-payments problems. I simply think that those resources should not be available to Cambodia or Uganda, to the extent that they are made available through U.S. participation in this organization.

During fiscal year 1976, a full 69 percent of foreign aid dispersed by American agencies and by U.S.-supported international agencies was allocated without congressional review—69 percent without any review by the Congress at all. This erosion of congressional authority over the use of foreign aid funds is deplorable, as it enables use of those funds for purposes alien to the interests of the American people.

Contrary to what some might suggest, this amendment does not violate our responsibility to the International Monetary Fund, nor does it inject politics into the operation of that fund. We are not attempting to dictate their policy. All we are doing, in fact, is defining U.S. policy. It seems to many Americans that it is about time we defined U.S. policy or about time we had a U.S. policy. That is perfectly within our legitimate rights, and does not violate the charter of the IMF. It is simply a statement of U.S. policy toward the organization, and not an attempt to dictate the behavior of the IMF. To be sure, I am hopeful that our policy statement will discourage decisions by the International executive directors to extend aid to Uganda or Cambodia, so long as they are in violation of human rights. But it is hardly a violation of the organization charters, as some would suggest.

PRECEDENTS

I point out, in addition, that there is precedent for this type of action. In 1974, the Senate approved an amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) requiring U.S. delegates to oppose World Bank concessional loans for countries which fail to sign the nuclear nonproliferation treaty after exploding a nuclear device.

In 1976, we approved an amendment requiring the U.S. delegate to the Inter-American Development Bank and African Development Fund to vote against loans for countries that consistently engage in gross violations of internationally recognized human rights. Again, in 1976, we agreed to an amendment sponsored by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, Mr. DOMENICI, requiring our representatives to the African Development Fund to oppose any loans to countries that give refuge to international aircraft hijackers. And last year, during discussion of the international financial institutions bill, the Senate approved an amendment offered by this Senator, to require our delegates to the World Bank and Asian Development Bank to vote against loans to Vietnam, Laos, or Cambodia. There are several additional instances of restrictive U.S. policy toward international monetary organizations, by virtue of congressional directive, and I ask unanimous consent that a list of such precedents be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEGISLATION AFFECTING U.S. POLICY TOWARD THE INTERNATIONAL BANKS

A. REQUIRED NEGATIVE VOTES

1965 legislation requiring the U.S. representative at the IDB to oppose concessional loans to any countries where the U.S. has suspended its bilateral aid program under terms of the Hickenlooper Amendment following an uncompensated expropriation of U.S. foreign investments.

1967 legislation requiring the U.S. representatives at the IDB to oppose any loans that directly or indirectly assist a country to acquire sophisticated or heavy military equipment.

1972 legislation (Gonzalez Amendment) requiring the U.S. representatives to oppose loans to countries that expropriate American investments.

1972 legislation (Rangel Amendment) requiring the U.S. representatives to oppose loans by the banks to countries that fail to take adequate steps to suppress the illegal drug traffic or the sale of such drugs to U.S. servicemen.

1974 legislation (Long Amendment) requiring U.S. representatives to oppose World Bank concessional loans (IDA) for countries which fail to sign the nuclear non-proliferation treaty after exploding a nuclear device.

1976 legislation (Harkin Amendment) requiring the U.S. representatives to the Inter-American Development Bank and African Development Fund to vote against loans for countries that consistently engage in gross violations of internationally recognized human rights, unless the loan would explicitly benefit poor people of the borrower country.

1976 legislation (Domenici Amendment) requiring U.S. representatives at the African Development Fund to oppose any loans to countries that give refuge to international aircraft highjackers, unless the loan would explicitly benefit poor people in the borrower country.

B. REQUIRED ADVOCACY ON CERTAIN ISSUES

1967 and 1973 legislation (Selden Amendment) directing the executive to seek the establishment of autonomous evaluation units within the international lending agencies.

1974 legislation in the foreign aid bill (Percy Amendment) directing U.S. representatives to seek action within the multilateral banks promoting the integration of women in national economies and improving the professional status of women within the banks themselves.

1975 legislation in the foreign assistance act requiring the President to seek new criteria in the banks evaluating countries in terms of their relative emphasis on aid to the poor and small farmers and their relative progress in things like infant health, population control, employment, and income distribution, and (by implication) new policies in the banks channeling more loans to countries with good performance records in these areas.

1976 legislation (another Long Amendment) directing the U.S. representative at the Inter-American Development Bank to seek a resolution making intermediate technology and light capital methods high priority emphases within the IDB's general program.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest that there is no doubt about the American public's attitude toward this question. There is virtually no support in this country for supply assistance of any kind—moral, technical, or economic—to Uganda or Cambodia, so long as they continue to persecute and execute tens of thousands of their own citizens. I suggest that this is an amendment which all of us can support, with a clear conscience, and with the faint hope that it might actually help encourage some movement toward more humane conditions in both of these countries.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, in connection with this amendment, just for the sake of keeping the record straight, I should like to detail the reasons why, as I understand it, the Treasury Department finds this type of amendment objectionable as it relates to the IMF. I will state my own position on it at a later time in the debate.

The objectionable feature comes from two points: One, the politicization of an international monetary agency dealing with the stability of money and exchange rates and balances of payments among nations, which is the IMF.

In connection with the debate on the Abourezk amendment, I already have given the legion of other political quarrels that could absolutely tear apart the IMF, if we accepted a political reason for the actions of individual countries in the IMF.

The second point, which also is very important with respect to this particular matter, is that this is not assistance by the United States. The amendment reads:

To oppose any extension of financial or technical assistance.

Then it goes on, "by the supplementary financing facility."

That is the basic error, because there we are trying, as I say, to introduce a political criterion for a vast international monetary organization, which would be appropriate if this were assistance by the United States; and, indeed, we have such provisions in our foreign aid authorizing legislation. But it is inappropriate where it relates to an international monetary organization.

Finally, we have just adopted an amendment relating to Uganda, and that amendment is found now in the bill, section 3(a). Part (e) of that amendment reads as follows:

The Congress directs the President to encourage and support international action including economic restrictions to respond to conditions in the Republic of Uganda.

It seems to me that this gives the President the appropriate directive within the flexibility which matters of this kind require to do what is desired, without running afoul of the politicization of the IMF, which the Treasury feels is to be sedulously avoided. Therefore, the amendment already adopted fully covers what should be done in the best interests of the country respecting the situation of Uganda as a possible prospective borrower from the IMF.

As to Cambodia, I say to the Senator, as a matter of information, that Cambodia is not eligible for supplementary financing assistance, because the IMF governing authorities have been unable to communicate with the Government of Cambodia for 2 years. Hence, they have not lived up to their obligations in terms of reporting, and so forth. So that that is academic. There is no privity between Cambodia and its opportunity or possibility of borrowing from the supplementary facility or to draw anything on the IMF generally.

That is the situation as I see it, Mr. President, with respect to this amendment.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, in considering this amendment, I want to point out an important distinction between it and a previous amendment that was laid aside temporarily, the Abourezk-Hatfield amendment.

One may agree or disagree with the criteria that amendment seeks to lay down, but that amendment sought to establish certain criteria which the U.S. Executive Director of the IMF would bring to the attention of the IMF in considering stabilization programs which the International Monetary Fund would set out when a nation sought to draw on the supplementary facility.

I think that issue is different from the issue that is posed by the amendment now before us, in which the judgment is made for the director with respect to a country drawing, when that country, under certain circumstances, might be entitled to make a draw under the IMF rule. In other words, it would have the right to do so. The amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Kansas, in effect, would require the interjection of opposition by the American Executive Director in an instance in which the country might, in fact, be entitled to draw.

That, I think, raises a different issue, and may well require a different response, from the issue posed by the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from Oregon and other cosponsors, which talks about the criteria which the IMF must consider in formulating its stabilization program.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will not quarrel with the statements made by either the distinguished Senator from New York or the distinguished Senator from Maryland. I think the record has been made, and I do not want to belabor the point.

I would like to include in the RECORD a list of the members of the International Monetary Fund as of June of this year. It indicates, at least, that Cambodia is a member and has a Governor and an alternate, and it gives a list of the other countries which belong to the IMF. I ask unanimous consent that this information be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Not a participant in the Special Drawing Rights Department of the Fund.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I only point out finally that there is flexibility. The amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas indicates again that the President shall instruct the Executive Director of the United States to the IMF to oppose any extension of financial or technical assistance by the supplemental financing facility, or by any other agency or facility, to Cambodia or Uganda until the President of the United States determines and certifies to the Congress of the United States that Cambodia or Uganda, as the case may be, is in compliance with internationally recognized human rights.

So it does give that degree of flexibility to the President to make that determination and advise Congress that he has made that determination that they are in compliance with what we consider to be recognized human rights.

We have had similar amendments before going back, as I understand it, to 1965. There was legislation adopted that affected our policy toward different international banks. That was followed again in 1967 and there were a number of successful attempts in 1972, 1974, and 1976. So there is precedent, and I understand that it does take away some of the flexibility of the Executive Director of the United States to the IMF, but I think Congress should make this point clear. As pointed out 69 percent of foreign aid expenditures have no congressional review. It seems to me Congress has made it rather clear in the statements that individuals have made and in the action we have taken both toward Uganda and Cambodia.

I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time. Or there is no time agreement, I guess. But I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no time agreement. The order states that no rollcall votes shall occur before the hour of 3 p.m. today.

Mr. DOLE. I hope at the appropriate time the Senator from Kansas may be permitted to ask for the yeas and nays, which I certainly will do, but there are not enough Senators present right now.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment of the Senator from Kansas be temporarily laid aside so that the Senator from North Carolina may propose an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1538

(Purpose: To condition the authorization of funds for the Supplementary Financing Facility of the International Monetary Fund)

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) proposes unprinted amendment numbered 1538:

SEC. 3. None of the funds authorized to be made available until the Secretary of the Treasury determines and certifies to the Congress that the average salary levels of personnel of the International Monetary Fund and of any related facility or agency of such Fund are not to exceed by 5 per centum the average salary levels of personnel in comparable positions subject to the civil service laws of the United States.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, in the schedule of salary payments to its employees, the International Monetary Fund persists in maintaining salary levels for its staff that are far above those of comparable civil service levels and private sector professions. This amendment is aimed at directly stemming this flagrant violation of prudent spending practices.

Under the present system, salaries paid by the IMF to its professional staff are, on the average, some 50 percent above those paid to U.S. civil service employees at the same levels.

Nearly 42 percent of the members of the professional staff at the IMF earn over $50,000 a year, and in the IMF, those who are at the IMF salary grade level of "i," which is comparable to a GS rating of 15, are paid $47,580 and up. Within the standard U.S. civil service salary schedule it is not possible to earn this amount of money until one is at level IV of the executive schedule. Section 5308 of title 5 of the United States Code limits the basic pay that can be received by employees below executive level IV to $47,500.

Mr. President, the U.S. civil service, which is the highest paid national civil service, has far less than 1 percent of its employees earning over $50,000. As a matter of fact, out of 1.4 million white collar workers employed in the U.S. civil service fewer than 2,500 earn salaries of $50,000 or more per year.

Therefore, it is almost utterly unbelievable that over 40 percent of the professional staff at the IMF earn the same salaries as only two-tenths of 1 percent of our own civil service. What is perhaps more ludicrous is that Congress, which is a part of the Government service, continues to authorize funds to the IMF to expand their overpaid bureaucracy.

We know that just about the only thing IMF economists have proved themselves good at is spending other people's money. Their duty supposedly is to help government officials bring spending levels back under control. If that is the case, I suggest that IMF officials start by setting an example within their own ranks by bringing their salary levels back into line with Government and private enterprise.

The IMF managers will argue that they need to pay such high salaries in order to attract the best possible talent. But there is much more to attracting capable people than simply offering the highest salaries. A number of other factors, such as reputation, reliability, and future prospects of the employing organization, also affect a person's decision when he or she is considering a new position. Perhaps the International Monetary Fund should concentrate more on some of these other factors to attract promising employees, rather than trying to bribe them away from government and private business positions. Look at the major banks in New York, for example. Bankers there have little trouble attracting able economists and administrators; yet, on average, less than 7 percent of their officers earn more than $45,000 per year.

There is a limit to the level of premiums we should be subsidizing to help motivate, if that is the proper word, IMF employees. Beyond a certain point it becomes absurd to continue offering benefits to IMF staffers.

What we want and what the taxpayers have a right to expect are hard workers, not people looking for an easy life.

Let us look at salaries again. Another reason they are so high is that the basic salary is "grossed up" to compensate for income taxes. The argument goes that most non-U.S. staffers at the IMF come from countries that do not levy income tax on employees of international organizations. Well, that may be true, but I can also assure you that the basic salary they start with is also nowhere near what the International Monetary Fund pays out. In calcultaing the grossed-up salary, the IMF assumes that all of their employees would take the standard deduction. As a wise man once said though, "when it comes to money, you can't trust anyone." U.S. employees at the IMF which make up some 25 percent of the staff, can realize substantial windfall gains by itemizing rather than taking the standard deduction. A non-American can also do quite nicely by the U.S. Tax Code. If, for example, he has investment income, it is taxed as if it were his only income—and not at the marginal rates that would apply above his salary. An American with investment income would pay at those higher rates.

The other perrequisites that come with IMF employment are equally impressive or, perhaps, the word is depressing if you look at it from the standpoint of the American taxpayer. They say that Washington is a hardship post. An interesting thought; I know the summers are hot, but I never thought they were that bad. IMF professional staff park their cars in a subsidized garage, eat in a subsidized cafeteria, and enjoy other fringe benefits like membership in the Bretton Woods Country Club for $42 a month. Foreigners also receive an education allowance: the IMF will pay up to $2.000 a year of the cost of sending a child to a U.S. primary or secondary school. The Fund will also pick up $2.500 of the cost for an overseas college education. And the list goes on and on.

Mr. President, I believe that if the American taxpayers were really made privy to this situation they would find the munificence of the IMF rather difficult to believe. Both former Secretary Simon and Secretary Blumenthal have vowed that they would cut IMF and World Bank salaries. Unfortunately, though, little has happened. Study groups have been formed by the Treasury, at considerable expense, to make recommendations on how best to reduce salaries. But what is needed is not study groups, but rather, action.

The answer is perfectly simple: Reduce IMF salaries until they are back in line with those at other institutions. It is obvious that this correction is long overdue, and it is about time we stop treating the IMF as a sacred cow.

If we are going to be providing the IMF with another $1.8 billion, let us remind them that, we are going to keep a close watch on how funds are spent, and we are not a bottomless well for funding IMF activities. Congress can cut through a lot of redtape and avoid later troubles for the IMF and the Treasury, by simply requiring IMF salaries to come down to rational levels if they want U.S. funding of the Witteveen Facility.

If we are good enough to provide the IMF with funds to help lesser developed countries, let us show them we are also good enough to recognize and treat this kind of inequality when we see it.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

(Mr. CHILES assumed the chair.)

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I just want to make a couple of comments on the amendment and the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina.

First of all, the purpose of the IMF is not to help lesser developed countries. The IMF is the institution under which the international monetary system is established, with the exception of the Soviet Union and certain Communist countries that follow the lead of the Soviet Union.

With respect to the rest of the countries in the world, it is the system which they have established to handle international monetary matters, and that is the basic function and purpose of the International Monetary Fund. So it is not unlike the development banks. It has not been established as a mechanism whose primary objective is assistance to lesser developed countries.

It is true that on occasion it formulates programs and makes balance of payments assistance available, which often has to run to the lesser developed countries, because they find themselves in those difficulties. But its essential function is as the the international monetary institution.

On this question of salaries, let me say, first of all, I do not accept the burden or the position of having to defend or of defending all the existing salary levels and the perquisites and privileges that exist, that may exist, for the personnel at the Monetary Fund and, in fact, I think a review of that situation is appropriate, and that some careful thought needs to be given to it. I commend the Senator from North Carolina in that regard in terms of the attention which he has brought to this issue.

The bill that is before use seeks to address this matter in two ways which, I think, are constructive and productive of good results and ought to be the approach which the Senate should follow at the present time.

The first is to place a limitation upon the compensation paid to the U.S. Executive Director and the U.S. Alternate Executive Director who, after all, are our people who were sent to the Fund to hold these top positions, and it places a limitation upon their compensation at a rate with respect to the Executive Director of not to exceed level IV in the executive schedule, and with respect to the alternate director, level V of the executive schedule. So there is a direct tie between their salaries and salaries for people working in the Government of the United States.

With respect to the general level of Fund salaries, the legislation provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall instruct the U.S. Executive Director of the Fund to present to the Fund's executive board a comprehensive set of proposals consistent with maintaining high levels of competence of Fund personnel, and consistent with the articles of agreement, with the objective of assuring that salaries and other compensation accorded Fund employees do not exceed those received by persons filling similar levels of responsibility within national Government service or private industry.

The Secretary shall report these proposals, together with any measures adopted by the Fund's executive board, to the Congress prior to February 1, 1979; namely, this coming February.

That amendment, which was put into the legislation by the Senate Banking Committee, requires our representative to the IMF to present to the IMF executive board a comprehensive set of proposals, and it is, of course, designed to examine carefully the assertion that the salaries at the Fund greatly exceed what individuals would be receiving either in their own governmental service or in private industry for jobs involving similar levels of responsibility.

I understand that the Fund and the World Bank have set up a joint committee to make recommendations to the government officials of those two organizations concerning salaries paid by the two institutions, and that our representative on the joint committee is seeking to have the concept set out in this amendment, this comparability concept, accepted as the governing concept for the payment of salaries. I think this is the appropriate way to address the problem which the Senator from North Carolina has outlined.

We are not, in a sense, in a position to dictate it unilaterally. There is the very real possibility, at the present time, that this approach, which reflects a seriousness being given to this problem—really, I think, for the first time, on the part of the managing officials of the institution—offers a real chance of producing results, and I would, therefore, suggest that we proceed with the approach set out in the bill, which offers, I think, a real chance of bringing about fruitful results, and I think is the appropriate way to approach this particular problem.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I wonder if I might ask my good friend from Maryland a question? Did I correctly understand him to say that the proposal would limit the Director to executive level IV compensation? I may have misunderstood him; I just wondered if he did say that.

Mr. SARBANES. It reads as follows:

> The United States executive director of the Fund shall not be compensated by the Fund at a rate in excess of the rate provided for an individual occupying a position at level IV of the Executive Schedule. . . . The United States alternate executive director of the Fund shall not be compensated by the Fund at a rate in excess of the rate provided for an individual occupying a position at level V.

Mr. HELMS. Yes; now, that level IV specifies a salary somewhere in the range from a $59,000 a year to $79,000 a year.

The problem with that, unless you are addressing yourself to the whole employee situation, is that there will be 50 employees at salary level IV, who will be paid from $71,710 a year to $91,240 a year, and above them there will be 46 employees who will be paid a minimum of $75,360 a year to a maximum of $94,470 a year, and 14 employees, or officials, if you prefer that word, who will be paid a minimum of $84,440 a year to a maximum of $102,550 a year.

I think the Senator will agree that there would be some problem of inequity in that respect. I simply wanted to point that out to him.

Mr. SARBANES. If the Senator will yield, I did not suggest that this limitation placed on our Executive Director and our Alternate Executive Director dealt with the broader problem of the levels of compensation paid by the International Monetary Fund Board to all of its employees. That is why I spent most of my time addressing the study that is underway, and the instructions which the Secretary of the Treasury is required under this legislation to give to our Executive Director in terms of the compensation that we think may well be the proper and applicable compensation in determining Fund salaries.

I only made that point to indicate that in that instance in which we have direct control over a person; namely, our own Executive Director, the legislation does contain limitations.

I do not think, first, that we can, or second, that we should, especially at the present time, seek to reach beyond that and impose, by our own legislation, the salary schedule of the International Monetary Fund, when we have a study underway on a compensation we think makes sense, and the possibility that that may be adopted, or some version of it will be adopted, as the governing policy of the Fund, which would then address itself to some of the salary ranges the Senator has pointed out.

Of course, one has to include in that the other aspects of compensation that people receive in addition to their direct salary, and of course that is, again, specifically alluded to in this legislation, which says, "salaries and other compensation." So the legislation is cognizant of that factor as well.

I think there is a good chance, especially with the February deadline for reporting to Congress—it is not an internal operation in the executive branch, as they report back to Congress—that a policy will evolve that will address this important question of comparability, what are reasonable salaries, and what is necessary in order to attract the kind of talent which it is essential that the International Monetary Fund have. They deal with extremely important problems. On the other hand, it ought not to be paying beyond what is necessary to get the sort of people that are needed to do the job.

I think we have underway now a process that may well bring about a very constructive and fruitful result, and I think we should stick to that approach, and not the one put forward in the Senator's amendment, although, as I say, I recognize the concern which he feels.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, just to indicate that I desire the yeas and nays on this amendment, I am going to ask for the yeas and nays now, knowing that there are not enough Senators on the floor for a second.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a sufficient second.

Mr. HELMS. I suggest the absence of a quorum, for the purpose of obtaining a second for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in order at this time for me to request the yeas and nays on the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment be temporarily laid aside, so that I may call up another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

AMENDMENT NO. 3318

(Purpose: To oppose certain assistance by the Supplemental Financing Facility of the International Monetary Fund to countries assisting aircraft hijackers and international terrorists)

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 3318, and ask that it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) proposes an amendment numbered 3318:

At the bottom of page 4 add the following:

SEC. 3. ——

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the bottom of page 4 add the following:

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury shall instruct the Executive Director of the United States to the International Monetary Fund to oppose any extension of financial or technical assistance by the Supplemental Financing Facility or by any other agency or facility of such Fund to any country the government of which—

(1) permits entry into the territory of such country to any person who has committed an act of international terrorism, including any act of aircraft hijacking, or otherwise supports, encourages, or harbors such person; or

(2) fails to take appropriate measures to prevent any such person from committing any such act outside the territory of such country.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, this amendment would instruct our Executive Director to the International Monetary Fund to vote against assistance to nations who provide aid or assistance to terrorists.

This amendment is very similar to one adopted by the Senate to the International Development Assistance Act by a vote of 75 to 4.

The only addition I made in this amendment was to include a provision instructing the U.S. Director to oppose aid to nations harboring aircraft hijackers as well.

As we know, the President recently signed a seven-nation agreement related to aircraft hijacking. I think this move is important, and I think that consistent with the President's efforts and interest in this regard, the Senate should move to put some teeth in this bill to put nations on notice that they risk U.S. opposition to any assistance they might get from the IMF, if they provide sanctuary for hijackers and terrorists.

I am familiar with the arguments that have been aired on this topic: That if we put any conditions on U.S. participation, then the whole concept of the International Monetary Fund has been thrown out the window.

Well, in an effort to accommodate those critics of "conditioning" U.S. participation, this amendment merely instructs the U.S. Director to oppose aid to certain countries. It does not condition the use of those funds.

Just as the U.S. Director to the World Bank is instructed to oppose certain loans from that institution, this amendment would instruct the U.S. Director to oppose certain aid from the IMF.

Now, one last point should be aired. What is terrorism? If it is not sufficiently clear, I will read one short definition I have found in an outstanding book by Mr. Frank Watson entitled "Political Terrorism: The Threat and the Response":

Political terrorism can be defined as a strategy, a method, by which an organized group or person tries to get attention for its aims, or force concessions toward its goals, through the systematic use of deliberate violence. Typical terrorists are individuals trained and disciplined to carry out the violence decided upon by their organizations. And, if caught, true terrorists can be expected to speak and act during their trials not primarily to win personal freedom but to try to spread their organizations' political ideas.

Mr. President, if in fact, this amendment is adopted, I would expect that the U.S. Executive Director would consult with agencies of the U.S. Government on which nations harbor terrorists and hijackers. If he does not satisfactorily fulfill these instructions, then during the course of congressional oversight of the International Monetary Fund, attention could be given to this problem.

In conclusion, I would like to say that our Nation, as the largest single contributor to the International Monetary Fund—if not to the smaller Witteveen Facility—has an obligation to act on this issue. It the United States does not act, it is signaling the world, that we do not consider this issue to be of great importance, and that is the greatest incentive to terrorism that I can conceive of. Terrorism is not something on which, we can stand neutral.

I yield the floor.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the opposition to this amendment again depends very definitely upon the fact that this is not aid or assistance. It is financing to which individual nations who are members of the IMF are entitled, just like we are. We have used it 23 times. The effort to limit, curtail, or determine the action of the United States, which exercises 20 percent of the voting power, simply weakens our position and gives us a lack of mobility to really have an effective influence in respect of nations like this.

There is no question about what our Executive Director will have to do, even if it is only the drawing which is permitted, what is called the first tranche, with no conditions at all, because the individual country would be drawing out its own money.

I believe this amendment is counterproductive and introduces political considerations into an agency whose laws, including our law on the subject, establishes only economic and financial criteria.

Therefore, it will not accomplish the result which is sought to be accomplished but simply hurt us in depriving us of the utilization of the heavy section of voting power in the International Monetary Fund to be used in a flexible way so that our influence may really be felt, primarily for economic and financial reasons.

For all of those reasons, Mr. President. I oppose the amendment.

I wish to point out, by the way, that the amendment is directed to all borrowings from the IMF, that it does not in any way limit itself to the supplemental financing facility. The amendment reads "to oppose any extension of financial or technical assistance by the supplemental financing facility or by any other agency or facility of such fund," to wit, anything, including a draw down of a normal tranche.

Mr. President, I would also like to point out, too, that, one, the President of the United States has come to a very admirable agreement with other major nations at the summit respecting something really effective on terrorism, which is a deprival of commercial aircraft service to and from including third countries that touches the airports of those who aid and abet terrorism.

Also, Senator RIBICOFF and I have a very effective bill on this subject which is working its way through the Congress, and which I have every confidence will be adopted. Again, it is an addition to the effectiveness of what the President has just done at Bonn.

For all of those reasons, Mr. President, I believe it would be ill-advised and counterproductive to adopt this amendment.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, if no Senator has further comment on the amendment, I ask unanimous consent that it be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I will indicate, Mr. President, that it is my intention to press for this amendment as well.

AMENDMENT NO. 2438

(Purpose: To provide for congressional review of continued United States participation in the Supplementary Financing Facility of the International Monetary Fund)

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I have an amendment No. 2438 at the desk. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) proposes an amendment numbered 2438.

Mr. HELMS. I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 3, line 9, strike out the quotation marks and the period following the quotation marks.

On page 3, between lines 9 and 10, insert the following:

"(c) The authority granted by this section for United States participation in the Supplementary Financing Facility expires at the close of fiscal year 1983.".

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the President has endorsed a proposal to provide for periodic reviews of Federal programs. Fifty-three Members of the Senate have cosponsored the legislation offered by the distinguished senior Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE), S. 2.

I propose limiting the program authorized in the bill before the Senate, S. 2152, to a 5-year period similar to that cited in S. 2, the Sunset Act of 1977.

The bill, S. 2152, formally titled the "Bretton Woods Agreement Amendments of 1978," authorizes U.S. participation in a new International Monetary Fund low-interest loan program called "The Supplementary Financing Facility" after the outgoing Director of the IMF, Johannes Witteveen, who worked hard obtaining commitments from various nations to set up this new program.

The U.S. negotiators have promised to put up 1,450 billion special drawing rights, an indefinable sum which, at the printing of the committee report, was about $1.77 billion. The SDR is an accounting device, as the distinguished Presiding Officer knows, based on the relative value of 13 currencies. Since those currencies float in the market and prices change daily, it is not possible to really say just how much the Treasury would be liable for if this program is approved.

Nevertheless, if the bill is approved, funds will be made available to the International Monetary Fund for use in the new facility for nations who are particularly hard hit by economic ills that have been ascribed to a number of problems.

Reading the material provided me on the bill, I find that the thrust of the arguments are in the direction of sustaining, financially, certain less-developed countries for a period of time. The bill contemplates loans of up to 12 years. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina feels that 5 years would not be too soon to see how progress is being made to assure the proper use of the funds provided by the taxpayers of the United States in that facility.

Perhaps at that time, added instructions should be given to U.S. representatives to the facility. Perhaps the need for the facility will have gone and U.S. participation will be no longer necessary. Perhaps, if the funds are not being used constructively, Congress would deem that different uses—such as returning them to the taxpayers—might better serve everyone concerned.

In short Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina feels that the time to start implementing the sunset concept is now. If a majority of the Senate is serious in its commitment to the regular review of the programs authorized by Congress, then this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, as I understand it, the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina would place a 5-year limit on American participation in the Witteveen Facility. If this amendment were to be adopted, its effect would be to prevent our participation altogether. The reason is that, although loans under the facility would be made during a maximum period of 5 years, financing provided by participants could be outstanding for up to 12 years. While the loans would be extended during a 5-year period they could be for as long as 7 years. So that, if you add the 5-year period during which the loans are being made to the 7-year maximum maturity for the loans themselves, the whole period of participation contemplated by this bill could run as long as 12 years. Therefore, the question that the Senate needs to pass upon is whether it is in our national interest to participate in the Witteveen Facility. I think it is. The Senator from New York thinks it is.

Both the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the Banking and Currency Committee have thoroughly reviewed the bill and find it to be in the national interest. Indeed, the stability of the international monetary system in the years to come could well depend upon our participation in the Witteveen Facility. That being so, Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will see fit to reject this amendment, since it would, if adopted, effectively prohibit American participation in the Witteveen Facility.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to my able colleague from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the views of my colleagues. I believe there are deep concerns about the international monetary system, which are very deep and very urgent. If we needed any further evidence of it, the terrific imbalance which is now being created by the fall of the dollar is a very clear illustration of the gravity of the problem, and the continued drain on the world's economy which comes from the price of oil, bearing most heavily upon the less-developed countries, which must get additional bank credit, and the banks are pretty well loaned up. They can roll things over, and they have done a marvelous job between 1973 and now. But now they are really running short of the additional new money which is required until there can be some acceleration in the world's production and turnover which will enable the developing countries to meet these deficits themselves.

So we face a very grave peril to the system, to which the Witteveen Facility is a bridge, an answer in terms of a bridge. To invalidate it by this provision is simply disregarding the terms of the Witteveen Facility and the reason for it. I believe the reason is absolutely entitled to the highest priority in terms of the monetary affairs of the world. We are contributing 17 percent, as against 83 percent being contributed by others, to a very essential rescue operation as far as the world monetary system is concerned.

I believe simply that one has the choice of proposing an amendment like this, which kind of assumes our interest in the sunset idea, even though it is not apposite at all for this particular situation and will tend to negate what we seek to do in this bill. For all these reasons, Mr. President, I hope the Senate will reject this amendment.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the Senate will vote later today on the IMF supplementary financing facility bill (S. 2152), commonly known as the Witteveen Facility. The United States is being requested to contribute 1.45 billion SDR's, which is equivalent to about $1.8 billion, to this facility. The funds made available by the United States will be used to support IMF-member countries suffering from chronic balance-of-payment deficits. In effect the facility will provide countries that have mismanaged their economics with the opportunity to further extend their credit and continue making the same mistakes that they have made in the past. It will, in addition, result in allocation of real resources to the recipient nations.

SOLUTIONS OR MORE PROBLEMS

Extension of credit to these deficit countries is definitely not an answer to their problems. It is merely a bridging operation that will hold them over until their next crisis or until the interest cost of their borrowings exceeds what they can pay. Some of these deficit countries have already gotten to the point where they finance the interest payments on their old borrowings by arranging for new loans in the international money market. In the past decade the external public debt of developing countries within the IMF has grown from $50.7 to $202.5 billion. That is a 400-percent increase. More importantly, however, it illustrates the alarming tendency of these "debt relief" loans to snowball into ever greater amounts. By providing such countries with more funds we will be only worsening their plight; not improving it.

The inability of these nations to repay their debts clearly indicates that the original loans are not performing as expected. As Roger Darling, a foreign service officer at the Agency for International Development noted in a recent Washington Post article:

> This fact is not at all surprising since many of the original loans should never have been made . . .
> Debts were contracted primarily to purchase the resources for development. Yet many poor nations have been subsequently unable to generate the productivity necessary to repay (these) debts.

This leads us to ask a basic question: Will additional loans to buy more development resources perform any better? Probably not. Most countries now in need of these loans are already living far beyond their indigenous capabilities. They simply do not have the ability to ultimately sustain their debt. By providing such countries with more funds we will be only worsening their plight, not improving it.

We all know that if an individual cannot meet the mortgage payments on his house, he should not be borrowing to buy a new car. The same is true for countries experiencing balance-of-payment deficits—they should put their affairs in order before further extending themselves. What we are effectively doing by providing additional loans to these countries is treating the symptoms of international economic maladjustments rather than the disease.

The IMF officials may argue that adjustment programs are required with their loans in order to require these deficit countries adopt appropriate spending and inflation levels. But the evidence indicates that precisely the opposite is in fact occurring. Of 54 countries which have accepted IMF austerity programs during the last decade some 43 have had to come back for additional assistance. If we look at recent examples of IMF assistance and austerity programs we see chaos and rioting replacing what was once confusion and discontent. In Mexico, Egypt, and most recently Peru, IMF programs have led to economic and political trauma without having had any truly beneficial effects on the economy. One may also look at the decline in the situation in Italy since the IMF allegedly "helped" that nation.

On the one hand IMF economists find it difficult to agree among themselves about what course is best to follow. On the other hand the IMF is continually being influenced by political factors which cause them to misdirect their economic tools away from the roots of the problem. The IMF-imposed austerity programs are a mish-mash of political compromise and economic hyprocrisy. The types of tax and wage programs IMF officials have advocated would never pass through the U.S. Congress. Little attention is evidently given to anything that would increase real productive employment and reduce the role of government in the economies of recipient nations. Like a mad doctor with a needle the IMF is practicing acupuncture on the world's economies. The IMF may well be doing more to complicate the economic problems of these countries than to mitigate them.

In a recent speech in London, Johannes Witteveen, the retiring IMF managing director, himself noted that there was no substitute for having deficit countries come to grips with their problems on their own:

> No country can use reserves or borrow indefinitely to finance sizeable payments deficits. Sooner or later, the time to finance comes to an end and the time to adjust arrives.

And he added:

> A country's adjustment program is likely to be successful only if the government itself clearly perceives that the adjustment is needed and is completely committed to seeing it through to its successful conclusion. For that national will and commitment, Fund (IMF) conditionality is not a substitute. The Fund can counsel and agree but it assuredly cannot—as is, unfortunately, so often said—"impose" policies and conditions.

Why then should we prolong the day of reckoning and further burden the American taxpayer? More extensions of credit to these deficit countries are clearly not an answer to their problems. Unless we act now it will only be a few short years before the IMF comes back to us with a request for an additional bigger supplementary financing facility and after that another and then another and so on. We have already seen that the IMF programs and policies are unequal to the task. We are only extending the hardships of the deficit countries and making their adjustment process more difficult by granting these multilateral loans and allowing them to continue following unwise economic policies.

WORLD CENTRAL BANK?

In a classic example of a bureaucracy attempting to justify and simultaneously extend its domain, the IMF is trying to establish itself as a "lender of last resort" in the international arena. The directors of the IMF undoubtedly would like to eventually see the IMF as a Federal Reserve-type bank on an international scale. Yet, the power that IMF now wields is all out of proportion to the powers that it was originally granted in their Bretton Woods Charter in 1944. Back in 1944 we were using a fixed exchange rate system internationally; under that system the IMF was supposed to help keep exchange rates stable by supporting countries that had difficulties maintaining the fixed values of their currencies. For nearly 30 years the IMF tried to artificially support exchange rates. With the advent of floating rates in 1973 this purpose of the IMF became totally passé. As Prof. Henry Hazlitt, a brilliant and widely respected economic commentator, recently wrote:

> Whatever stabilizing function it (the IMF) may once have served ceased completely on August 15, 1973 when the U.S. openly abandoned gold convertibility for the dollar. The IMF's continuance now is inexcusable . . . from the beginning its only effect has been to function as an engine of inflation.

Yet the bureaucracy of the IMF is continuing to grow and it has been going into areas of responsibility which the IMF was never meant to enter. As I mentioned, the IMF management has not attempted to cast the institution into a role as the supplier of world liquidity—a "lender of last resort"—on the international scene. Loans made by the IMF rose from $5 billion in 1974 to over $14 billion in 1976. In this regard it has added extra liquidity—and at a time when the world is awash with sources of available liquidity.

Just as the Federal Reserve Bank in the United States can affect the domestic money supply through manipulation of bank reserves, so also can the IMF affect the world money supply through manipulation of world currency reserves. When the IMF loans out dollars which the United States has supplied, international liquidity increases. When the country which received IMF aid utilizes these funds the world money supply effectively increases. This whole process whereby world monetary liquidity is increased by IMF lending has a substantial inflationary impact on the world economy. Inflation, let us remember, is a monetary phenomenon and not caused by labor unions, businesses, anchovy supplies, or oil prices.

A country which has received a loan from the United States, through the IMF, will find its spending power increased by the new funds it has received. As it purchases goods and services with these "new" funds, it will drive up the prices of those goods and services in the marketplace. The increased demand from these countries will push up prices until the supply of goods and services they require is in line with the new demand. That is the way the marketplace works. Everyone in the world, including American consumers, are subject to the higher price level.

In a free market the buyer of resources could only return to the credit market if he had made effective, productive use of the resources he borrowed and proved to be a good credit risk. If he could not show that there was something of substance from the resources he had borrowed then he must forfeit his right to return to the marketplace until he can prove his capability. Unfortunately, this is not true of the deficit countries, which are being subsidized to return to the market and consume added resources without proving their credit worthiness. At the same time they are driving up the prices of scarce resources. This is an abbreviated version of the process that is occurring but it is, nevertheless, an accurate portrayal of the net effect of these loans.

If we want to put a stop to this inflation machinery the only recourse we have is to withhold the funding of IMF inflationary programs. Unlike the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve in the United States, the Executive Directors of the IMF seem to have no responsibility to an authority besides themselves. In 1976, for example, the IMF began selling off its gold reserves including some $700 million of American gold donated to maintain the old system of fixed exchange rates.

The proceeds from this sale are being used to provide aid to less-developed countries. A loophole in the IMF Charter was used to avoid the necessity of obtaining congressional approval for this new foreign aid venture. The loophole that the IMF used was something called the "scarce currency clause," a revision in the IMF Charter which states that the IMF can sell off its reserves if certain currencies are declared to be in short supply. In taking advantage of this loophole, however, the IMF clearly did not stick to the letter of the law. In a study prepared by the American Law Division of the Congressional Research Service it is shown that the enabling portion of the IMF Articles of Agreement, article VII section 2 "does not appear to give the specific or implied power for the proposed disposition."

The IMF, in effect, sold U.S. gold for the agrandizement of the lesser developed countries, an act which Congress had never contemplated or intended when it first transferred some of its gold holdings to the IMF. Furthermore, although the United States originally contributed the gold at the "official price" of $35 per ounce the IMF sold it at a market price of over $150 per ounce. That is a very handsome profit; too bad we will not be seeing any of it.

There are only limited assurances that the IMF will not attempt a similar appropriation of the U.S. assets sometime again in the future. Rather than allow the IMF to become another welfare bureaucracy on an international scale we must hold its spending level down.

IMF STAFF NEEDS AUSTERITY

The IMF, as much as any of the countries it is supposed to be helping, is in need of an austerity program. The ridiculously high level of IMF salaries, some 22 percent above comparable U.S. civil service levels, is just one more example of how excessive spending—of other people's money—pervades the bureaucracy at the IMF.

IMF FUND SHOULD REQUIRE APPROPRIATION

The Senate adopted the Schweiker amendment to require allocations of funds to the IMF be included in the Federal budget in order that they receive the scrutiny that other transactions do. After all, the dollars supplied by the United States to the IMF are lent by them to other nations that ultimately purchase real resources, either from the United States or from other countries. This transfer of resources by all concepts of budgetary analysis should be included in our total budget as it:

First. Increases the aggregate demand for U.S. goods and services; and Second. Increases the borrowing requirements of the federal governments. U.S. contributions to the World Bank require an appropriation as do most bilateral loans. Recently, for example, the United States negotiated a bilateral loan to Portugal on terms similar to those anticipated for Witteveen Facility lending and this loan required an appropriation. Why not, then, loans that are channeled through the IMF? The Schweiker-Proxmire-Brooke amendment requiring an appropriation for this facility is aimed at correcting this apparent contradiction in our policies. If we are to maintain an effective budgeting system in this country our criteria must remain consistent.

IMF CONDITIONALITY QUESTIONED

The Witteveen Facility will provide us with a good opportunity to tighten up some of the excess and ineffective spending habits of the IMF. We have been paying little attention to how the funds loaned out by the IMF are being used, and it is becoming increasingly obvious that these loan programs need closer scrutiny. Not only is it doubtful that the funds not serving their purpose in terms of supposedly helping countries to readjust, but we are now also finding out that some of these funds are being used in opposition to our national interests. The Peruvians, for example, have been accused of purchasing a quarter-billion-dollar fleet of Russian jet fighters, because of the proceeds from their last loan. This is not the way we want our money to be spent. If we are going to be giving aid we should know how it is going to be spent. Supplicant nations are plentiful. If the IMF cannot give us guarantees that our funds will be used properly, it is of no use to us as a middleman.

IMF AND THE BIG BANKS

It should be clear to all of us that the Witteveen Facility is not a necessity by any means. Perhaps the best way of looking at it is by seeing it as a subsidy for the big banks that have made massive, and ill advised, loans to the Third World. America's big banks have loaned over $60 billion to these countries. Several of these loans are in danger of failing. For all practical purposes several of the larger loans have failed already. It is only additional borrowings and Government guarantees that keep interest payments up to date. One banker highlighted the problem when he said "(cutting) back on development loans would take away the means of earning the funds to repay the existing debt." Pakistan, for example, has a foreign debt nearly the size of its GNP and Peru, whose economy is in turmoil, owes $1 billion, 300 million of it to banks. What are the bankers doing to protect these risky loans? Well, one thing you can be sure of, they would be anxious to transfer the risks of these loans over to the American taxpayers through the Witteveen Facility. By denying U.S. assistance to this facility we will be telling the banks to be more careful with their loans and warn them that Uncle Sam is not always going to be pulling their chestnuts out of the fire. The last thing we need now is another New York City bailout on a global scale.

Let us stop subsidizing mismanagement both at home and abroad. If a country wants to obtain credit let it answer to the conditionality imposed by the free market and not the politically motivated conditionality imposed by the IMF or foreign governments. If market forces were allowed free reign, the current account deficits of countries living beyond their means would correct themselves. Their exchange rates would adjust, and the lower rates would bring trade back into balance by raising the prices of imports and lowering the prices of exports.

We have a choice before us; either we can cast a vote to promulgate continued subsidies for mismanaged economies, or we can cast a negative vote for the Witteveen Facility and thereby negate those forces which are obstructing the adjustment process. Let us not fool the taxpayers into thinking they are helping the poor when, in fact, they are prolonging the agony of the adjustment process. What is needed is not more IMF control, but rather less IMF involvement.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill be laid aside temporarily, until 1:45 p.m. today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

VETERANS' AND SURVIVORS' PENSION IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 945, S. 2384.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2384) to amend title 38 of the United States Code in order to provide a security pension program for non-service-connected disabled veterans of a period of war who are in need, for surviving spouses of veterans of a period of war who are in need, and for surviving children of veterans of a period of war who are in need; to provide for annual automatic cost-of-living adjustments in the security pension program; to prevent reductions in security pension benefits solely attributable to cost-of-living increases in social security benefits; and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Veterans' Affairs with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that in anticipation of consideration of S. 2384 later today, the following members of the Veterans' Affairs Committee staff be accorded the privilege of the floor beginning at 12:30 p.m. and until final disposition of that measure: Garner Shriver, Gary Crawford, John Pressly, Ed Scott, Jon Steinberg, Mary Sears, and Babette Polzer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to suggest the absence of a quorum, without the time being charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HODGES). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, S. 2384 as reported by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs on July 17, 1978, the proposed Veterans' and Survivors' Pension Improvement Act, is the product of a sustained 5-year effort to reform and restructure the need-based VA pension program. The enactment of pension reform legislation in the 95th Congress is a major priority of the committee.

Mr. President, with the cosponsorship of all the members of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, and the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS), on December 15, 1977, I introduced S. 2384, which I shall refer to as "the committee bill," a bill intended to correct very serious inequities and deficiencies in the Veterans' Administration need-based pension program for wartime veterans who are totally and permanently disabled from non-service-connected causes or age 65 or over and the survivors of wartime veterans.

Mr. President, the impetus for this legislation was the VA's testimony in June 1973, that the program contains inconsistencies and inequities which cannot be corrected without a thorough restructuring. In 1975, our committee reported, and the Senate passed, S. 2635, a pension reform measure. Regrettably, that bill was not accepted by the House, but in this session, the House has passed H.R. 10173, a bill similar in many respects to our committee bill.

Mr. President, there are about 2.6 million persons receiving VA pension benefits under the current program—1 million veterans and 1.6 million surviving spouses and children. In 1978, the VA budget for this program is $3.4 billion according to CBO.

Mr. President, the basic purpose of the committee bill, as reported, is to provide for a new, more equitable and adequate pension program—to be known as improved pension. The improved pension program is designed to achieve the following major objectives:

First, assure an income standard above the Department of Labor's poverty guidelines so that all eligible veterans and survivors receive a pension commensurate with their need;

Second, prevent eligible veterans and survivors from having to turn to welfare;

Third, treat similarly circumstanced veterans and survivors equally;

Fourth, guarantee regular annual increases in improved pension benefits based on the increase in the Consumer Price Index;

Fifth, guarantee that annual increases in improved pension benefits occur at the same rate and at the same time as cost-of-living increases in social security benefit rates—so that no person in the improved pension program will suffer a reduction in pension solely attributable to a cost-of-living increase in benefits under social security or any other Federal retirement program; and Sixth, insure that our needy World War I veterans are not forgotten.

Since filing the committee report on July 17, the committee received, on July 24, a revised CBO estimate. The revised CBO estimate indicates that the net 5-year outlay costs resulting from the enactment of S. 2384 would be $515,800,000 in fiscal year 1979; $776,300,000 in fiscal year 1980; $1,086,200,000 in fiscal year 1981; $1,444,200,000 in fiscal year 1982; and $1,824,700,000 in fiscal year 1983.

Mr. President, those costs indicate the total increased Federal outlays required for each fiscal year, taking into account offsetting outlay reductions in function 600 for AFDC and SSI benefits and in function 550 for medicaid expenditures; they are based on the assumption that, in the absence of pension restructuring legislation along the lines of the committee bill, Congress would not enact any cost-of-living increases in the current pension program. That assumption, however, in the committee's view, is not realistic in view of continuing inflation and congressional actions in the last decade granting cost-of-living increases. Rather, it is much more realistic to measure the costs of the committee bill against the "current policy" costs of the present program, that is, against the estimated costs of the present program including future cost-of-living increases which could be expected if the committee bill were not enacted. The July 24 revised CBO estimate of the 5-year outlay costs of the committee bill in those terms, by fiscal years is as follows:

|---|---|
| 1979 | $419.3 |
| 1980 | 470.0 |
| 1981 | 582.5 |
| 1982 | 745.6 |
| 1983 | 930.8 |

In addition, I would also note, Mr. President, that the OMB long-range cost estimate of the "maximum" costs of the current program discussed in the committee report, compared to the estimated long-range costs of the committee bill, indicate that sizable cost savings—in the vicinity of $500 million—would be achieved by 1985 if the bill is enacted this year and those savings would rise thereafter to approximately $1.7 billion by fiscal year 1995.

Moreover, Mr. President, these cost projections do not take into account the very distinct possibility that Congress would, in the absence of the enactment of pension reform legislation, not only enact annual cost-of-living increases but would also enact social security benefit passthrough legislation, along the lines of the provisions proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. MCINTYRE) and passed by the Senate last year in a 68-to-20 rollcall vote, as well as some kind of World War I service pension program. These two measures together—social security passthrough and World War I service pension—would increase the costs of not proceeding with pension reform by about $2 billion each fiscal year beginning in fiscal year 1980. Mr. President, I intend to have the full text of the CBO estimate printed in the RECORD at a later point in my remarks.

Mr. President, before yielding to my good friend from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) for whatever remarks he wishes to make at this time, I want to say to the Senate what a great privilege it is to work with him on the Veterans' Affairs Committee. No committee in the Congress ever had a more cooperative working relationship between majority and minority than we do on the Veterans' Affairs Committee. Our approach there is truly bipartisan and nonpartisan. In this Congress, for example, all our bills have been ordered reported unanimously.

BOB STAFFORD'S work as ranking minority member of the committee, and Garner Shriver's as minority counsel, offer a model for all to emulate. I am personally deeply grateful for his many courtesies and tremendous contribution to the committee's business and I know that America's veterans share my gratitude for his efforts.

Mr. President, I want also to mention the great work of each and every one of our other committee members on this measure: the Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE) who serves so ably as the chairman of our Subcommittee on Compensation and Pension and has made such a valuable contribution to the pending measure; the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH), the ranking majority member of the Subcommittee on Compensation and Pension, who is rushing back from West Virginia to be with us to join in the voting to approve this measure; the Senator from Florida (Mr. STONE); the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. DURKIN); the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. MATSUNAGA), the vice chairman of the subcommittee; the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND); and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN).

Mr. President, now I would like to speak at greater length on the pending measure, S. 2384, as reported by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs on July 17, 1978, the proposed Veterans' and Survivors' Improvement Act, is the product of a sustained 5-year effort to reform and restructure the need-based VA pension program. The enactment of pension reform legislation in the 95th Congress is a major priority of the committee.

BACKGROUND OF LEGISLATION

Mr. President, with the cosponsorship of all the members of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, and the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS), on December 15, 1977, I introduced S. 2384, which I shall refer to as "the committee bill," to correct the inequities and other deficiencies in the Veterans' Administration pension program. The original impetus for a thorough reworking of the pension program was provided by the testimony of the VA in June 1973, that the current pension program contained "inconsistencies, inequities, and anomalies, which cannot be corrected unless the entire framework of the program is restructured."

During the 93d and 94th Congresses, the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, under the chairmanship of Senator Vance Hartke, conducted extensive investigations, held hearings, and reviewed studies by the VA on the pension program. On December 9, 1975, our committee favorably reported S. 2635, a comprehensive reform measure. That bill was passed unanimously by the Senate on December 15, 1975, but the House did not act on it in the 94th Congress.

However, section 404(a) of Public Law 94–432, the Veterans and Survivors Pension Adjustment Act of 1976, declared it to be the sense of the Congress that the existing pension program—

First, does not provide sufficient assistance to meet the needs of some eligible veterans and survivors;

Second, has developed some inconsistencies, inequities, and anomalies which prevent it from operating in the most efficient and equitable manner; and Third, subjects many pensioners annually to reductions in their pensions.

Therefore, in section 404(b) of that law, Congress mandated that by October 1, 1977, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs report to the President and Congress findings and recommendations based on a comprehensive investigation, analysis, and evaluation of existing and alternative non-service-connected pension programs.

Mr. President, on January 30, 1978, the Veterans' Administration submitted to the Congress its report entitled "Analysis and Evaluation of the Non-Service-Connected Pension Program." In the report, the VA described the inequities it had identified in the current program and recommended that a new pension program be developed in accordance with certain principles advocated by the VA.

On February 3, 1978, the full committee held hearings on S. 2384. Testimony was received from Dorothy Starbuck, Chief Benefits Director of the Veterans' Administration, and other representatives of the VA, and representatives of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, AMVETS, Paralyzed Veterans of America, Disabled American Veterans, Veterans of World War I, and Military Widows.

Mr. President, after reviewing the hearing testimony and the VA's report, and giving consideration to various recommendations made by VA staff in discussions with staff of the committee, we met in open session on March 23, 1978, to consider S. 2384 and unanimously voted to report the committee bill with an amendment in the nature of a substitute and a title amendment.

BASIC PURPOSE

The basic purpose of the committee bill, as reported, is to provide for a new, more equitable and adequate pension program—to be known as improved pension. The improved pension program is designed to achieve the six major objectives I outlined earlier.

The committee bill also provides for a similar new program of need-based dependency and indemnity compensation benefits—to be known as improved dependency and indemnity compensation for surviving parents—for the needy surviving parents of veterans who died as a result of service-connected disabilities. In addition, it provides for a cost-of-living increase in the pension payable to certain institutionalized veterans. Finally, it names two Veterans' Administration hospitals located in Tampa, Fla., and Bedford, Mass., after James A. Haley and the late Edith Nourse Rogers, respectively.

SUMMARY OF PROVISIONS

Mr. President, the committee bill has five titles: I—Improved Pension for Veterans and Survivors; II—Improved Dependency and Indemnity Compensation for Surviving Parents; III—Miscellaneous Provisions and Conforming Amendments; IV—Naming of Certain Veterans' Administration Hospitals; and V—Effective Dates.

Title I: Improved Pension for Veterans and Survivors.

Mr. President, the provisions of title I would:

First, establish a new program of pension benefits to be known as improved pension, generally payable monthly to needy wartime veterans who are permanently and totally disabled by reason of non-service-connected disability, or who are 65 or over, with the following annual rates, reduced by the amount of the annual countable income of the veteran and that of the veteran's spouse and dependent children, if any:

|---|---|
| Veteran without dependent spouse or child | $3,240 |
| Veteran with one dependent (spouse or child) | 4,284 |
| Veteran in need of regular aid and attendance without dependents | 5,340 |
| Veteran in need of regular aid and attendance with one dependent | $6,384 |
| Veteran permanently housebound without dependents | 4,016 |
| Veteran permanently housebound with one dependent | 5,060 |
| Two veterans married to one another | 4,284 |
| Increase for each additional dependent child | 660 |

Second, provide for a 25-percent increase in improved pension benefits payable to veterans of a period of war if veterans of that period of war—such as World War I—were not made eligible for VA educational assistance or home loan benefits similar to those provided under chapters 34 and 37 of title 38, United States Code, or prior corresponding provisions of law.

Third, establish a new program of improved pension benefits payable monthly to needy surviving spouses, of wartime veterans with annual rates for permanently and totally disabled surviving spouses, those who are 65 or over, and those who have a dependent child aged 6 or under or helpless, equal to those applicable to veterans; with rates for disabled surviving spouses in need of regular aid and attendance equal to those for veterans, and with an increase for each additional dependent child equal to that payable to a veteran for an additional dependent child. The applicable annual rates, reduced by the amount of the surviving spouse's annual countable income, and by the income of dependent children, if any, are as follows:

|---|---|
| Surviving spouse age 65 or over or permanently and totally disabled without dependent children | $3,240 |
| Surviving spouse age 65 or over or permanently and totally disabled with one dependent child | 4,284 |
| Surviving spouse with one dependent child age 6 or under or helpless | 4,284 |
| Surviving spouse permanently and totally disabled in need of regular aid and attendance without dependent children | 5,340 |
| Surviving spouse permanently and totally disabled in need of regular aid and attendance with one dependent child | 6,384 |
| Other surviving spouse without dependent children | 2,172 |
| Other surviving spouse with one dependent child | 2,868 |
| Increase for each additional dependent child | 660 |

Fourth, establish a new program of improved pension benefits payable monthly to each of the needy surviving children of wartime veterans. Such children would be eligible if there is no surviving spouse, if the surviving spouse is ineligible for pension by reason of income or remarriage, or if such children are not in the custody of the surviving spouse. The applicable annual rates, reduced by the child's annual countable income and by the incomes of any persons with whom the child is residing who are legally responsible for the child's support under the laws of the State in which the child resides, are as follows:

|---|---|
| Each surviving child not in the custody of a person legally responsible for the child's support under the laws of the State in which the child resides | $660 |
| Each surviving child in the custody of such a person (not to exceed) | 660 |

Fifth, require that all income from whatever source derived be counted for purposes of determining eligibility and the amount of improved pension payable, subject to the following exclusions:

First. Donations from public or private relief or welfare organizations;

Second. Amounts equal to amounts paid by a surviving spouse or child for the veteran's just debts and the unreimbursed expenses of the veteran's last illness and burial;

Third. Amounts equal to amounts paid for the last illness and burial expenses of a veteran's spouse or child;

Fourth. Fire insurance policy proceeds;

Fifth. Profit from the sale of real or personal property other than in the course of a business;

Sixth. Amounts in joint accounts acquired by reason of the death of the other coowner.

Seventh. The amount of $780, plus one-half of the amount which exceeds $780, of the current-work income, not otherwise excluded, of the veteran and the veteran's spouse and any children for whom the veteran is receiving increased improved pension, of the surviving spouse and any children for whom the surviving spouse is receiving increased improved pension, or of the surviving child; or $1,560, plus one-half of the amount which exceeds $1,560 of the current-work income, not otherwise excluded, of a veteran in need of regular aid and attendance and the veteran's spouse and any children for whom the veteran is receiving increased improved pension, or of a surviving spouse in need of regular aid and attendance and any children for whom the surviving spouse is receiving increased improved pension. In the case of a dependent or surviving child's current-work income, such income would be countable—and thus subject to the exclusion described above—only to the extent that it exceeds the amount of income required before the child must file a Federal income tax return under section 6012(a)(1)(A)(i) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954; postsecondary educational or vocational rehabilitation training expenses paid by the child would also be excludable from a dependent or surviving child's current-work income. For the purposes of these provisions, the term "current-work income" is defined as earned income within the meaning of section 401(c)(2)(A) and section 911(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. Those sections generally provide that "earned income" means income from wages, salaries, professional fees, or net income from self-employment. An unmarried person is presently required to file a Federal income tax return under section 6012 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 if such person's taxable income exceeds $2,950;

Eighth. Amounts equal to the lesser of amounts in excess of $100 or 5 percent of annual income, which were paid in the previous calendar year for unreimbursed medical expenses by the veteran, the veteran's spouse, the surviving spouse, or by or on behalf of the surviving children if such expenses were reasonably necessary for the health care of the veteran, the veteran's spouse or child for whom the veteran receives increased improved pension, the surviving spouse, the surviving spouse's children for whom the surviving spouse receives increased improved pension, or the surviving child or children. Where VA health care is available, however, this exclusion would be disallowed under the following circumstances. When such an exclusion has been allowed in a previous year for expenses incurred for services at a non-VA facility despite the fact that adequate health-care services were readily available at a VA facility, a further exclusion for such expenses would be disallowed if, after notice, they are incurred for services of the same kind and such services continue to be readily available at a VA facility;

Ninth. Amounts equal to amounts paid in the previous calendar year by a veteran or surviving spouse in need of regular aid and attendance for expenses incurred in traveling to and from such person's place of employment, to the extent that such expenses exceed those which would have been incurred by a nondisabled person using an appropriate means of transportation; and Tenth. Amounts equal to amounts paid in the previous calendar year by a veteran or surviving spouse pursuing a course of education or vocational rehabilitation or training for educational expenses, including tuition, fees, books, materials, and, in the case of such a veteran or surviving spouse in need of regular aid and attendance, related unusual transportation expenses.

Sixth, require that the payment of improved pension be denied or discontinued when the net worth of a veteran, including the net worth of the veteran's spouse and any dependent children for whom the veteran receives increased improved pension, is such that some portion thereof could reasonably be expected to be used for the support of the veteran. Similar provisions would require the denial or discontinuance of improved pension if the net worth of a surviving spouse, including the net worth of dependents, or of a surviving child, including the net worth of any persons with whom the child is residing who are legally responsible for the child's support, is excessive. In all cases, amounts reasonably set aside for educational or vocational purposes would be excluded from the determination of a dependent or surviving child's net worth.

Seventh, require income and net worth reports to be filed annually with the VA by any person applying for or receiving improved pension; and require prompt notifications to the VA by such persons of changes in income and net worth and in the dependency status of family members, with exemptions (to be established under regulations to be prescribed by the Administrator) from such annual reporting for categories of persons whose sole incomes are federally derived and regularly received.

Eighth, allow all persons residing in the 50 States or the District of Columbia entitled to VA pension under provisions of law in effect on the day before the effective date of the new program to elect benefits under the improved pension program or to continue receiving benefits under such provisions as long as they remain eligible under the terms and conditions of such provisions, as in effect on the day before the effective date of the new program.

Ninth, provide that no person residing in the 50 States or the District of Columbia who becomes entitled to VA pension on or after the effective date of the new program shall be entitled to receive benefits under provisions of law in effect on the day before such effective date unless such person's application was pending on such day.

Title II: Improved Dependency and Indemnity Compensation for Surviving Parents.

Mr. President, the provisions of title II would:

First, establish a new program of improved dependency and indemnity compensation benefits—DIC—to be known generally as improved dependency and indemnity compensation for surviving parents—or improved parents' DIC—payable monthly to the needy surviving parent or parents of a veteran who died as a result of a service-connected disability, if the veteran provided one-half or more of the annual support of such parent during the year immediately preceding the veteran's death, with the following annual rates, reduced by the amount of the parent or parent's annual countable income and the income of a remarried parent's spouse which is available to or for such parent:

|---|---|
| One parent or each parent, if the parents are living apart | $3,240 |
| Two parents living together | 4,284 |
| One parent (or each parent, if the parents are living apart) in need of regular aid and attendance | 5,340 |
| Two parents living together, one of whom is in need of regular aid and attendance | 6,384 |
| Two parents living together, both of whom are in need of regular aid and attendance | 8,484 |

Second, establish income determinations and exclusions, net worth determinations, and annual reporting requirements similar to those provided for under the improved pension program established under title I of the bill.

Third, allow parents residing in the 50 States and the District of Columbia who are receiving benefits under provisions of law in effect on the day before the effective date of the new program to elect improved parents' DIC benefits if they are eligible or to continue receiving benefits under such provisions as long as they remain eligible under the terms and conditions of such provisions, as in effect on the day before the effective date of the new program.

Fourth, provide that no parent residing in the 50 States or the District of Columbia who becomes entitled to parents' DIC on or after the effective date of the new program shall be entitled to receive benefits under provisions of law in effect on the day before such effective date unless such parent's application was pending on such day.

Fifth, prohibit improved parents' DIC benefits from being paid to parents residing outside the 50 States and the District of Columbia, and allow such parents who become eligible on or after the effective date of the new program to apply for and receive DIC benefits under provisions of law as in effect on the day before the effective date of the new program as long as they continuously reside outside the 50 States and the District of Columbia.

Title III: Miscellaneous Provisions and Conforming Amendments.

Mr. President, the provisions of title III would:

First, redefine, in part, dependency and indemnity compensation and pension to mean a monthly or other periodic payment.

Second, provide that a reduction in or discontinuance of improved pension or improved parents' DIC benefits resulting from a change in income or net worth would be effective at the end of the month in which the change occurs.

Third, require the VA to increase improved pension and improved parents' DIC rates annually by the same percentage and at the same time as social security cost-of-living increases.

Fourth, require the VA to redetermine the amount of improved pension or improved parents' DIC to which a person is entitled at the same time that social security benefit payments are increased in such a way that no person in either of the improved programs would suffer a reduction in improved benefits attributable to a cost-of-living increase in social security benefit payments or payments under any other Federal program which are increased in accordance with the social security increase.

Fifth, provide that any person who is receiving pension or parents' DIC benefits on the effective date of the new programs who elects benefits under either of the improved programs within 3 calendar months of such effective date shall be paid improved benefits which exceed benefits already paid retroactive to the effective date.

Sixth, provide that benefits under the improved pension program may not be paid to any person residing outside the 50 States and the District of Columbia, but that any person residing outside the 50 States and the District of Columbia on the effective date of the new program who becomes eligible for pension on or after such effective date may apply for and receive benefits under provisions of law as in effect on the day before such effective date as long as such person continuously resides outside the 50 States and the District of Columbia.

Seventh, require a comprehensive study by the VA of the issues involved in the payment of pension benefits to persons residing outside the 50 States and the District of Columbia, including analyses of those aspects of the economies of the countries or U.S. territories, possessions, or commonwealth where such persons reside which are relevant to such issues, estimates of present and future costs of pension benefits or improved pension to such persons, and recommendations to the Congress on the desirability of modifying the pension program in effect on the day before the effective date of the new program for such persons or extending benefits under the improved pension program to such persons.

Eighth, provide that the maximum pension payable to a veteran who has no spouse or child shall not exceed $60 per month after, first, 2 full calendar months of VA domiciliary care, second, 3 full calendar months of VA hospital or nursing home care, unless the VA determines that a continuation of pension benefits for an additional 3 months will facilitate the veteran's return to the community, or third, the month of readmission for such care if the readmission occurs within 6 months of a period of care lasting 2 full calendar months or more.

Title IV: Naming of certain Veterans' Administration hospitals.

Mr. President, this title provides that the VA hospital in Tampa, Fla., and Bedford, Mass., shall be named the "James A. Haley Veterans' Hospital" and the "Edith Nourse Rogers Memorial Veterans' Hospital," respectively.

Title V: Effective dates.

Mr. President, this title provides for an effective date of October 1, 1978, for the improved pension and improved parents' DIC programs, and for provisions relating to the protection of benefits under existing provisions of law and the limited retroactivity for persons making prompt elections of improved benefits. Other provisions of the bill would be effective upon enactment.

Mr. President, in order that all Senators and the public may have a full understanding of the various provisions of this measure, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point pertinent excerpts from Senate Report No. 95-1016 accompanying this bill.

The excerpts follow:

BACKGROUND

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF THE NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED PENSION PROGRAM

Overview

During this century, this Nation has been involved in two world wars and two major conflicts. During each of those four periods of war, millions of Americans have served in our Armed Forces.

There are now 29.8 million veterans of service in the Nation's Armed Forces, of whom 26.2 million are veterans of wartime service. In recognition of the sacrifices made and hardships incurred by the Nation's veterans and of their invaluable service to our national defense and security, veterans' programs serve a wide range of purposes. Those purposes include compensating those who have suffered injury or disease in line of duty for their resultant loss of earning capacity, providing them with the best possible health care and rehabilitation services, and helping to meet the financial, educational training, and certain other essential needs of the surviving dependents of those who died in service or as the result of service-connected causes. Readjustment assistance—primarily educational benefits under the GI Bill for wartime veterans and employment assistance—is provided for the purposes of compensating veterans for the losses of educational and employment opportunities during their active-duty service and helping them make a successful, productive readjustment to civilian life. VA home-loan guaranties are provided to assist veterans to become homeowners. The VA pension program is intended to provide income assistance to needy, non-service-connected disabled and elderly wartime veterans and the needy survivors of wartime veterans for the purpose of affording them a reasonable measure of security so they can live their lives in dignity.

Pension benefits are awarded, not because of the needs arising directly from military service, but because the Nation owes a special obligation to those persons who took up arms in its defense during time of war. Pensions have been granted on the basis of some specified period of service plus other qualifications such as indigence, inability to perform manual labor, disability in some degree incurred after the termination of the war, the attainment of a certain age, or various combinations of those elements.

Prior to World War II, pensions were neither provided nor promised at the time the war was being fought. In fact, from the Revolutionary War through the Spanish-American War, pension laws applied only to veterans of a specific war and were enacted many years after the war ended when the veteran population was advanced in age and reduced in numbers. However, the period between the termination of the war and the enactment of pension legislation generally grew progressively shorter.

The main concern of pension legislation has been to keep wartime veterans and their survivors from destitution. Even where financial need was not required to be shown it was assumed to exist in the cases of most beneficiaries by reason of old age. (Where entitlement to pension is based solely on service for a specified length of time during a particular wartime period, the pension is referred to as a "service pension".)

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE CURRENT PROGRAM

The Veterans' Pension Act of 1959
(Public Law 86-211)

From 1933 until 1959, the veterans' pension program consisted of "all-or-nothing" determinations of eligibility. Persons whose incomes did not exceed the specified income limitations received benefits, and the benefits payable to persons with income close to the income limitations were identical to benefits payable to those who had no income or very little income. If one's income exceeded the income limitation by as little as $1, pension benefits were terminated and one's aggregate income was drastically reduced.

In order to make the pension program more responsive to the needs of the recipients, steps to correct the inequities and deficiencies inherent in the "all-or-nothing" pension structure were necessary.

In 1955, President Eisenhower established a President's Commission on Veteran's Pensions and appointed General Omar Bradley as Chairman. In April 1956, the Commission—which had become known as the Bradley Commission—published its findings and recommendations in a comprehensive report entitled Veterans' Benefits in the United States.

* * * * *

Further investigation and research by the Congress, together with the recommendations made by the Bradley Commission, led to the enactment of the Veterans' Pension Act of 1959 (Public Law 86-211) which, with substantial amendments discussed below, is the basis for the need-based pension program in existence at the present time. In that law, pension entitlement was adjusted to correspond with the individual recipient's other income. A three-tier structure replaced the one-tier benefit in order to provide a measure of responsiveness to the varying degrees of need of individual recipients.

Thus, enactment of Public Law 86-211, with its graduated levels of pension benefits, gave expression to the philosophy that non-service-connected pension entitlement should be based on the needs of individual recipients. That law was a major advance in the design of a pension program for wartime veterans and survivors truly responsive to need.

In 1964, anticipating an increase in social security benefits, Congress amended the pension law as revised by authorizing an exclusion of 10 percent of all payments to an individual under public or private retirement, annuity, endowment, or similar plans or programs in determining the annual income of the pensioner. Thus, in addition to a general rate increase, the 10-percent exclusion provided for in Public Law 88-664 generally assured that no individual's pension benefits would be reduced because of the expected social security increase in that year. At the same time Congress also created another exclusion from countable income—the exclusion of all of a veteran's spouse's earned income or $1,200, whichever was the greater.

In 1967, Congress enacted a cost-of-living pension rate increase of 5.4 percent in Public Law 90-77. The following year, 1968, in Public Law 90-275, Congress again increased pension rates and also provided for a $200 increase in the maximum annual income limitations to mitigate against prospective terminations from pension which would occur because of the 13-percent increase in social security benefits that year. The same Act replaced the three-level system of pension rates with a multilevel increment system. Under the previous three-level system, a slight increase in outside income often could result in a disproportionate decrease in a veteran's pension. The enactment of a benefit schedule in which the pension amount was reduced by as many as 20 incremental steps for each $100 of annual income was designed to permit a more orderly and gradual reduction in monthly benefits whenever there was an increase in outside income.

In 1970, in enacting Public Law 91-588, Congress again diminished projected adverse effects on pensioners because of that year's 15-percent increase in social security benefits. It raised the current maximum annual income limitations by $300 and increased the rates by 9.5 percent.

Under early pension laws, the structure of the pension system was such that a small increase in outside annual income could, at certain levels, result in a sharp drop in pension or in a person being dropped from the pension rolls completely. For most pensioners, whose income was not close to such cutoff points, however, outside income could increase substantially with no effect on pension payments or eligibility. When the program, in the interests of equity, was restructured so as to be more sensitive to increases in outside income, that is, more clearly attuned to actual need, another problem arose which became particularly acute. Whenever there were cost-of-living increases in social security, or other similar retirement benefits, which were not offset by pension rate increases of the same or a greater amount, the individual's pension was reduced. Thus veterans complained that whatever social security increase Congress gave with one hand it took back in reduced pension with the other. The reduction in pension was sometimes greater than the increase in social security benefits, producing a decline in the aggregate income of the veteran or survivor.

In Public Law 92-198, enacted in 1971 in response to social security increases that year, Congress increased the pension rates and the maximum annual countable income limitations and adopted rate-decrement-income limitation formulas for establishing the pension rates. The formulas, based on the incremental-step benefit schedules, provided a means by which pension benefits could be calculated to the penny and were intended to prevent the net loss of aggregate income for any pensioner who continued to qualify for a pension and who received an increase in outside income. Under the formula approach, the monthly benefit is computed by reducing the maximum monthly rate by a specified number of cents for each dollar of an individual's annual countable income which exceeds the maximum annual countable income level for the applicable step.

Since 1971, the enactment by Congress of a pension rate increase has meant an increase in the maximum monthly rates and annual countable income limitations by the specified percentage and adjustments in the formulas so that the less-than-maximum rates would reflect the increase.

Because of the July 1972 social security increase, approximately 20,000 pensioners—14,200 veterans and 5,800 survivors—were scheduled to be dropped from the pension rolls on January 1, 1973, the effective date of annual redeterminations of entitlement to pension benefits. Concerned about that situation, the Committee on Veterans' Affairs held hearings on September 12, 1972, to consider legislation to ameliorate the adverse impact of social security increases on pensioners and to adjust for continuing inflation. Subsequently the Committee unanimously ordered reported S. 4006, which would have increased maximum annual income limitations by $400—the approximate amount of the average social security increase—and would have increased the base pension rates by about 8 percent.

The measure unanimously passed the Senate in the closing days of the session on October 11, 1972, but the House was unable to consider pension legislation prior to sine die adjournment.

The subsequent terminations of many persons from the pension rolls in January 1973, as a result of the social security cost-of-living increase which was effective the previous July, focused attention on the pension structure. Although rate increases and increases in the annual income limitations appeared essential to prevent continuing inflation from eroding the purchasing power of pension benefits and to prevent eligibility terminations, many in Congress and in the Administration recognized that the practice of frequent adjustments in the benefit schedule was creating distortions in the equitable structure envisioned by Public Law 86-211 and tended to spread the limited resources available for the pension program more and more thinly. Persons with little or no other income received inadequate benefits while increases in the income limitations tended to result in the payment of very small benefits to large numbers of persons in higher income categories. Each successive rate increase and income limitation adjustment compounded this distortion and led to the anomalous situation, which prevails today, in which substantial numbers of persons with incomes well above the poverty threshold receive benefits, while many other pensioners must seek assistance from social welfare programs such as Supplemental Security Income and food stamps merely to meet their subsistence needs.

This situation has led to the effort to bring about major reform, an effort which has now continued for 5 years.

PREVIOUS PENSION-REFORM MEASURE—S. 2635 AND ITS BACKGROUND

93d Congress

During the 93d Congress, the Committee undertook a comprehensive review of the pension program. In testimony before the Subcommittee on Compensation and Pensions on June 18, 1973, representatives of the VA asserted that there were a number of "inconsistencies, inequities, and anomalies" in the present pension system. They advocated a thorough examination and complete revision of the system which, they asserted, could be accomplished quickly, but the VA did not offer a formal draft of legislation for that purpose.

* * * * *

On March 15, 1974, the Administration submitted a formal draft legislative proposal. The transmittal letter stated:

"The enclosed draft measure would (1) fill the gap between the resources available to a veteran and his dependents and a national minimum standard of need; (2) treat veterans and widows equally with regard to income and benefit amount; (3) eliminate the inequities arising from exclusions of income—consideration of family income as a whole; (4) contain an automatic cost-of-living adjustment working simultaneously with that applicable to social security and eliminate the lag in adjusting pension for increase in income; (5) provide benefits which guarantee a minimum income of $166 per month for a single person and $249 per month for a person with one dependent; and (6) provide a hold-harmless provision to permit present recipients of pension to continue receiving benefits under the present provisions of law with a 4-percent rate increase and thereafter, automatic cost-of-living increases."

* * * * *

From information then currently available to the Committee, however, it was apparent that the actual proposals made by the VA would be unduly restrictive and unacceptable in operation. Few of the veterans or surviving spouses in need of pension could qualify under the new system proposed by the Veterans' Administration. For example, if that proposed pension system had been applied to the population of veterans and surviving spouses then receiving VA pensions, almost two-thirds would have been ineligible for pension benefits. It was evident that variations had to be considered and additional information was necessary before the Committee could proceed with pension restructuring.

Public Law 93-527

In the meantime, it was necessary to proceed with an interim cost-of-living measure in order to protect VA pensioners from the continued toll of inflation. Thus, Congress enacted S. 4040, the Veterans and Survivors Pension Adjustment Act of 1974, as Public Law 93-527. In addition to providing an average 12-percent increase in the pension rates and a $400 increase in the maximum annual income limitations, Public Law 93-527 also directed the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to carry out an original study of the needs and problems of veterans and their widows 72 years of age and older. The study was to include a profile of the income characteristics of such veterans and their widows describing the proportion and amount of such income from all sources, and the average cost for all necessities such as rent, food, medical care, and other items. The study was also to evaluate the adequacy of benefits for and the expected mortality rates of such pensioners.

The law further directed that a report of the results be furnished the President and the Congress together with any recommendations for legislative or administrative action to improve the present program of pension benefits for such veterans and widows.

Public Law 93-527 also provided that "in no event shall the monthly rate of pension be less than $5." This provision of a "minimum pension" appeared necessary because there were persons whose countable nonpension income did not exceed the income limitations, but for whom the application of the formula would yield very small amounts of pension or in some cases none at all.

On July 22, 1975, the Veterans' Administration transmitted its "Study of the Needs of Older Veterans and Widows", as required by Public Law 93-527.

Graphic evidence that the current pension system is not fulfilling its objectives can be found in that study of the needs of older veterans and widows. The raw data produced by the study has been of great value to the Committee. The data revealed, for example, that large numbers of veterans and widows had incomes below the poverty threshold; 30 percent of the veterans and nearly 37 percent of the widows interviewed reported they could not afford all the food they need; 25.1 percent of the veterans and 20.9 percent of the widows could not afford to pay for all the medical attention they need; and nearly 36 percent reported problems concerning adequate housing.

This study and the continued exposure of anomalies and inequities in the present pension program combined to argue forcefully and persuasively for fundamental restructuring.

The Committee then formulated S. 2635, introduced by then Chairman Hartke and cosponsored by most members of the Committee. The VA, however, did not support S. 2635. It testified that the bill incorporated many of the concepts contained in its draft proposal submitted the previous year, but it opposed the bill principally for the reason that the 8-percent cost-of-living increases in titles II and IV of the bill as reported were not in keeping with the Administration's policy of "holding the line" at 5 percent. On December 15, 1975, S. 2635 passed the Senate unanimously but it was not acted upon by the House and died with the adjournment of the 94th Congress.

S. 2635, the proposed "Veterans and Survivors Pension Reform Act of 1975", generally, would have:

Adopted income standards for all eligible veterans and surviving spouses of $2,700 for a veteran without dependent family members and $3,900 for a veteran with one dependent family member, reduced dollar for dollar by the other income available to a pensioner;

Reduced significantly the number of income exclusions permitted under current law;

Provided for automatic cost-of-living increases based on annual increases in the Consumer Price Index.

In 1976, the Senate considered another pension bill, H.R. 14298, which had passed the House June 21, 1976, and basically provided for a cost-of-living increase in pension benefit levels. On August 4, 1976, the Senate voted to amend H.R. 14298 by substituting the provisions of S. 2635. On September 9, 1976, the House amended H.R. 14298 to contain its original text and it was subsequently signed into law as Public Law 94–432.

Before final passage, however, H.R. 14298 was also amended to require a comprehensive study of the pension program. That amendment, section 404 of Public Law 94–432, provides as follows:

SEC. 404. (a) The Congress finds and declares that the pension program for non-service-connected disability or death, authorized in chapter 15 of title 38, United States Code, and administered by the Veterans' Administration—

(1) does not provide sufficient assistance to meet the needs of some eligible veterans and survivors;

(2) has developed some inconsistencies, inequities, and anomalies which prevent it from operating in the most efficient and equitable manner; and

(3) subjects many pensioners annually to reductions in their pension.

The Congress further finds and declares that it lacks sufficient long-range information as to actual and anticipated financial characteristics of potential pensioners (and their families) upon which to estimate costs of existing alternative pension programs.

(b) No later than October 1, 1977, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall submit a report to Congress and the President. The report shall contain the findings and recommendations of a comprehensive investigation, analysis, and evaluation of existing and alternative non-service-connected pension programs, and shall include, but not be limited to, the following:

(1) Income characteristics of veterans and survivors currently in receipt of non-service-connected pension.

(2) Actual and anticipated long-term financial characteristics of pensioners including those veterans and survivors (and their families) who may be potentially eligible for benefits under the non-service-connected pension program during the next 25 years.

(3) Identification and analysis of existing inequities, anomalies, and inconsistencies contained in the current non-service-connected pension program.

(4) Current and proposed income exclusions.

(5) Particular problems and needs of catastrophically disabled non-service-connected pensioners.

(6) Alternative proposals which—

(A) assure a level of income for eligible veterans at or above the national minimum standard of need;

(B) treat similarly circumstanced pensioners alike; and

(C) provide the greatest amount of assistance to those with the greatest amount of need.

(c) On the basis of the investigation, analysis, and evaluation required to be made in subsection (b), the report shall identify alternative courses of legislative or administrative action (including proposed legislation) and long-range cost estimates therefor which, in the judgment of the Administrator, would result in a more equitable non-service-connected pension program.

PREPARATION AND INTRODUCTION OF S. 2384

In the 95th Congress, Senator Alan Cranston succeeded Senator Hartke as Chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee. On March 15, 1977, the Committee met in executive session to consider its recommendations to the Senate Budget Committee for the fiscal year 1978 Congressional budget and established as a major priority the enactment during the 95th Congress or pension restructuring legislation. Much time had passed since the introduction of S. 2635, and, while the general structure of the program that would have been established under that measure was clearly equitable, the Committee recognized that the legislation could be substantially improved. Drafts of legislation based on the principles of S. 2635 but with substantially increased benefit levels and other modifications were prepared and submitted to the Congressional Budget Office and the Office of Management and Budget for development of cost estimates for the drafts. The Committee expected to receive the data contained in the VA pension report, due to be submitted to the Congress on October 1, 1977, as well as the administration's recommendations, to assist in putting the draft legislation in final form. However, informal communications from the VA in November 1977, indicated that the report might not be submitted to the Congress until as late as January or February of 1978. In order to provide ample time for review by the administration, the veterans' service organizations, and other interested parties prior to hearings planned for February 1978, the Committee decided to prepare the bill for introduction before the end of the first session of the 95th Congress.

In the meantime it had become evident that a reform measure could not be enacted with an effective date in fiscal year 1978. Therefore, pending achievement of comprehensive reform, Congress passed H.R. 7345, a bill to provide cost-of-living increase of approximately 6.5 percent in the pension rates and the annual income limitations. The Committee, in its report (S. Rept. No. 95–374) accompanying H.R. 7345, dated July 29, 1977, reiterated its commitment to the achievement of equitable and adequate pension-restructuring legislation. H.R. 7345 was signed into law on December 2, 1977, as Public Law 95–204.

On December 15, 1977, the Chairman introduced S. 2384, the proposed "Veterans' and Survivors' Income Security Act", with the cosponsorship of all members of the Committee and Senator Williams.

On January 30, 1978, the VA submitted to Congress the report mandated by section 404 of Public Law 94–432. Entitled "Analysis and Evaluation of the Non-Service-Connected Pension Program" (hereinafter referred to as the "VA Pension Report"), it consists of twelve chapters, numerous tables, and an appendix which provides a wealth of data about the current pension program, including analysis of inequities and anomalies in the program. In addition, the report recommends the development of a new non-service-connected pension program incorporating principles specified in the concluding chapter and outlined in the discussion of the VA's testimony on S. 2384, infra.

HEARING ON S. 2384

On February 3, 1978, the Committee held a hearing on S. 2384. Testimony was received from Dorothy Starbuck, Chief Benefits Director of the VA, and other representatives of the VA, The American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Disabled American Veterans, AMVETS, Veterans of World War I, Paralyzed Veterans of America, and Military Widows.

VA position

The VA, although stating that the existing pension program is "an immense improvement over earlier programs", identified the following major deficiencies which it had previously described in its pension report:

"While need is one of the traditional and currently legal requirements for entitlement to pension, need is not met sufficiently for a significant number of pensioners.

"Also a spurious need is created by certain exclusions of money available to meet need, but which are not counted as income for pension purposes.

"A central defect of the current pension program is that it fails to provide adequate assistance to many pensioners.

"Another difficulty with the current program is the two variable system. It does not accurately relate pension benefits to pension need. The two variables are the annual income limitations, and a sliding scale of rates. Adjustment of the income limitation to correspond with the increase in cost of living, while beneficial to those in the higher income bracket, does little or nothing for those with minimal or no income, those who have the maximum need.

"One of the most unfortunate and abrasive aspects of the current program lies in the reduction of benefits at the end of the year in which an increase in income has occurred rather than a reduction simultaneous with increases in other income. While well intentioned, it is discriminatory in that it favors those receiving such increases by providing continued receipt of pension at the higher rate for the remaining months of the year. It is abrasive in that it effects a reduction long after the increase in other income has been experienced and after the recipients have become accustomed to a higher total income.

"Still another inconsistency and inequity results from the exclusion of all or part of income actually received from determinations of income for pension purposes. There are instances where veterans living with a spouse may receive pension even though the spouse is earning a very considerable salary, while another veteran whose spouse is retired and whose retirement is countable receives no pension.

"There is one other inequity of the present program, the unequal treatment as between a veteran and a surviving spouse.
